A Bibliography of Works on Reflexivity

"I don't have to quote anybody else to say what I could say for myself."

--Anon.

Section One: Introduction

"Reflexivity" is the generic name for all kinds and species of circularity. It includes the self-reference of signs, the self-application of principles and predicates, the self-justification and self-refutation of propositions and inferences, the self-fulfillment and self-falsification of predictions, the self-creation and self-destruction of logical and legal entities, the self-augmentation and self-limitation of powers, circular reasoning, circular causation, cyclic and spiral recurrence, feedback systems, mutuality, reciprocity, and organic form. It includes the fallacious, the vicious, the trivial, and the question begging, but also the sound, the benign, the useful, and the inescapable. It ranges from the prosaic to the numinous, from the paradoxical to the self-evident, from science to religion. It is reality and appearance, native to the processes of the world and to our knowledge and discourse about them.

Because this diversity is unified by a shared structure, that structure deserves a more general name than "self-reference," which has frequently served in the past. Usage in logic and mathematics has already favored "reflexivity" as the general term, and usage in philosophy and the sciences is moving in that direction.

This bibliography is the first to attempt to cover the range of reflexivity. Only by trying to approach completeness have I realized how limited the final product is. When collecting citations over such a broad area one must make innumerable decisions at innumerable borderlines. The result is not only that many borderline citations are excluded, but that the ideal of completeness is shattered. No topic as broad and deep as reflexivity has sharp borders; instead those borders are set for different purposes at different places. My decisions for this bibliography have largely been made explicit. Hence, I can say with some precision what the scope of the bibliography is, but for the same reason I cannot be satisfied that I have captured everyone's idea of reflexivity.

Decisions to exclude citations have tended to be of three kinds.
(1) Sometimes the works on a certain topic shade from a hard core of relevancy to marginal irrelevancy. For example, many works on the theory of types or the possibility of self-deception are strongly relevant while others are predominantly essays on irreflexive aspects of those topics. This kind of shading off occurs with virtually every sub-topic of reflexivity. (2) Sometimes the works of a certain type are excluded because their great number outweighs their limited pertinency. Either all would have to be included, diluting the strength of the bibliography, or blurring its focus, or arbitrary decisions would have to be made, distinguishing the less relevant of the little-relevant from the more relevant of the little-relevant. I found this to be the case with works on dialectical logic, organic form, systems theory, metaphilosophy, the (psychological or ontological) "self", recursive function theory, the physics and astronomy (but not the 'theology') of rotary motion, the geometry of circles, spheres and related curves, mutuality in the law of contract, most of the law on renvoi, particular studies of physical feedback devices, and (most regrettably) much of the literature on Gödel's theorems. (3) Finally, some kinds of citations must be excluded, even though directly germane, because of their great abundance and because finding them in sufficient numbers would unduly delay the final draft or multiply the expenses of the compiler. This was not a consideration in my collection of citations, but it necessarily became a consideration in deciding which citations would be included in this printed version. Under this head I have unfortunately had to exclude works not in the English language, and English reviews of such works. I sincerely hope that I have laid a foundation on which others may build.

This scope was maintained for works published up to 1984. No attempt has been made to be as complete for more recent works.

Although it is incomplete, the bibliography is large. It is so large that it would be nearly useless without some form of index. I have adopted two methods of cross-referencing. First, I have picked 28 rubrics or sub-species of reflexivity that usefully classify most citations. They attempt to serve both as the major subdivisions of reflexivity, by theme, and as the broadest categories into which the citations fell, as it were, actuarially. The rubrics are:

- Computer Science
- Dissertations
- Feedback
- Freedom
- Hermeneutic Circle
- Heterological
- History
- Impredication

Liar
Metaphysics
Omnipotence
Paradox
Petitio Principii
Reflexivity in Art
Reflexivity in Law
Reflexivity in Literature
Reflexivity in Natural Science
Reflexivity in Religion
Reflexivity in Social Science
Russell's Paradox
Self-Application
Self-Deception
Self-Fulfilling Prophecies
Self-Justification
Self-Reference
Self-Refutation
Theory of Types
Vicious Circle

The last quarter or so of the text of the bibliography (Section Three) consists of the rubrics in alphabetical order, with the surnames of authors arrayed under them, also in alphabetical order, indicating which citations in the main list (Section Two) are pertinent to that sub-topic. For some rubrics I added a word or phrase to the authors' names to indicate the specific angle of their attack on the sub-topic. In this way, one searching for works on the paradox of the liar looks at the names under the rubric "Liar". A more particular interest in discussions of Ushenko's "new" version of the liar paradox takes one to the parenthetical phrases following the authors' names.

I must emphasize that citations are provided with specifying phrases in this way, and listed under rubrics, often on account of connections or contents evident from their titles alone. This reason is simply that I cannot pretend to have read all the works in the bibliography. Hence, many citations may be devoted to Ushenko's liar, for example, and not be so indicated in the cross-reference lists. However, in many cases I have annotated works that do not seem, from their titles alone, to concern reflexivity at all.

For economy, works on the liar paradox, for example, are listed only under the rubric "Liar" and not also under the rubric "Paradox" unless there is an independent reason for the two listings. Only four reflexive paradoxes have rubrics to themselves: the Epimenides or liar, Grelling's or the heterological paradox, Russell's or the set paradox, and the paradox of omnipotence. Works on other reflexive paradoxes may be found by scanning for appropriate qualifying phrases in the "Paradox" rubric.

The second method of cross-referencing occurs within the main alphabetical list (Section Two) itself. Works about particular thinkers are listed under those thinkers. For example, Gregory Vlastos's essay on self-predication in Plato is listed under "Plato". Under "Vlastos" the reader will find a cross-reference to Plato.

In the main list, an author's own works are listed first, alphabetically by title, not chronologically. Any works devoted to that author are collected at the end of his or her space in the alphabetical sequence. When a work is on two or more thinkers, it is listed under the author's own name; under each of the subject thinkers there is a cross-reference back to the full citation. Works reviewed by others in the list are usually so noted in the citation itself. Co-authored works are listed in full only once, under the lead author, but a cross-reference back to the full-citation is listed under each co-author's name.

Finally, the reader should note that I have used strict alphabetization. Spaces and recapitalization within surnames are ignored. "McAardvark" would come after "Macaardvark", not before as some conventions have it. "De Aardvark", "Van Aardvark", and "Van der Aardvark" would be listed as if spelled "Deaardvark", "Vanaardvark", and "Vanderaardvark".

I wish to acknowledge my reliance upon two excellent bibliographies already published: that on the paradox of the liar in Robert L. Martin's THE PARADOX OF THE LIAR (q.v.), and that on self-fulfilling prophecies and their kin in Richard L. Henshel's "Self-Altering Predictions" (q.v.). I also wish to thank two hard-working student assistants, Bill Stark and Kevin Leshner, for their accurate typing of illegible 3" x 5" cards onto disk, and two others, Marilyn Piety and Eric Larson, for their labor in completing incomplete citations and supplying omissions.

I apologize to authors and readers for omissions that remain, either by a 'borderline decision' or oversight. There are sure to be as many in the second category as in the first. Bibliographies of this size become boundless undertakings, and after one's deliberate decisions of scope have been made with a wincing confidence, one must face the decisions made by the running out of time and funds, and accept them. While the bibliography still grows at a scholarly pace needed for completeness and accuracy, this printed version is a snapshot of its adolescence.

Additions and corrections to the bibliography will be received with gratitude. I may be reached at the Department of Philosophy, Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana, 47374.
