Political parties are the basic building blocks of representative democracy. They reduce information costs for voters, enhance executive accountability, and contribute to democratic governability by facilitating legislative organization and aggregating the interests of powerful societal groups. Yet we continue to know relatively little about the conditions under which strong parties form. The dominant theories of party-building are mostly based on historical studies of the United States and Western European countries, almost all of which developed stable party systems. Drawing on this literature, a segment of the early scholarship on party-building in third-wave democracies optimistically took ‘party development’ for granted, assuming that parties would follow from democracy, cleavages, or certain electoral rules. Yet party-building outcomes in third-wave democracies fell short of scholars’ initial, optimistic expectations. In many third-wave polities, social cleavages, attempts at electoral engineering, and decades of democratic competition did not produce durable parties. On the other hand, in numerous third-wave democracies, new political parties did take root. What accounts for the variation in party-building outcomes observed across the developing world? More generally, under what conditions does party-building succeed?

Drawing on evidence from fourteen months of interviews and archival research in Brazil, Mexico, Peru, and Argentina, this project provides the first systematic comparison of party-building success and failure on the Latin American new left. It argues that most new parties do not survive because they do not build strong organizations composed of committed activists. As a result, they do not withstand early crises. Paradoxically, parties with strong organizations and committed activists are more likely to form under conditions of adversity. Office-seekers with low access to state resources and mass media have an incentive to do the difficult work of organization-building. Intense polarization and conflict (e.g., civil war, populist mobilization) generate committed activists by producing the higher causes that spur individuals and groups to collective action. New party-builders are more likely to experience this cluster of adverse conditions under authoritarian rule.

Acknowledgments

I owe an enormous debt of gratitude to my advisers, Jorge Domínguez, Steve Levitsky, Fran Hagopian, and Al Montero. They devoted many, many hours to this project and stuck with me through thick and thin (mostly thin). I am deeply grateful to all of them.

I dedicate this dissertation to my parents, Madeline and Phil Van Dyck.
Political scientists rarely agree, but on the importance of political parties, they speak in near unison. Parties play an indispensable role in representative democracy. They reduce information costs for voters, extend politicians’ time horizons, and contribute to democratic governability and stability by socializing elites, aggregating the interests of powerful societal groups, facilitating legislative organization, and enhancing executive accountability.

Yet parties remain weak in much of the developing world. Over the last two decades, established parties have declined or collapsed across Africa, Latin America, Asia, and the post-Soviet world. Moreover, despite decades of competitive elections and repeated efforts at electoral reform, relatively few new parties and party systems have taken root. Strong

1[Modem democracy’, writes Schattschneider (1942), ‘is unthinkable save in terms of political parties’ (1).

2By reducing information costs for voters, parties increase political participation, a central value within normative democratic theory. On Downs’ (1957) classic account, voting exacts costs to the individual, not only in money and transportation time, but also in the time and effort required to form a preference between candidates. Because people are busy and/or relatively uninterested in politics, they are unlikely to acquire sufficient candidate information in the absence of information shortcuts. Downs argues that parties, by representing simple principles and policy stances, make it easier for ordinary citizens to form preferences between numerous candidates. Hence, parties increase the likelihood that ordinary citizens will vote and become politically active.

3By extending politicians’ time horizons, parties improve long-term policy outcomes. Parties have instrumental value for office-seekers, providing the money and organizational resources necessary to run successful campaigns, and in some cases delivering a significant portion of automatic votes from partisans in the electorate (Aldrich 1995: 24-5). Yet parties, viewed as unitary actors, are more likely than individual politicians to have long time horizons and national – as opposed to local or regional – goals, and hence to stake out positions in favor of policies and ideas with long-term, universal benefits for national populations (Levitsky and Cameron 2003: 3).

4Parties help protect the interests of powerful societal groups, whether elites (Gibson 1996) or mass-based civil society organizations (Collier and Collier 1991), reducing the likelihood of mass praetorianism (Huntington 1968). Parties make legislative debate more simple and efficient, unite the positions of large groups of legislators, and sometimes unite the positions of presidents and groups of legislators, all of which increase democratic governability (Mainwaring and Scully 1995, Mainwaring 1999, Levitsky and Cameron 2003). They act as a check on presidential power, socialize elites, and – when firmly rooted in the electorate – reduce the likelihood that political independents will gain power. In all these ways, they help check or prevent the emergence of major politicians who lack governing experience and a strong commitment to democratic institutions.
new party systems have emerged in some countries but in many others they have not and in a few countries party systems have decomposed entirely.

Party weakness has destabilized democracy. Where party systems have collapsed and not been rebuilt, democracies have often fallen into crisis (e.g., Russia). In contrast, where successful party-building has occurred, democracies have typically become consolidated (e.g., Brazil).

Despite the clear importance of parties, we continue to know relatively little about the conditions under which strong parties form. The dominant theories of party-building are mostly based on historical studies of the United States and Western European countries, almost all of which developed stable party systems. These works explore how electoral institutions (Duverger 1954; Lijphart 1994), social cleavages (Lipset and Rokkan 1967), and access to patronage (Shefter 1994) shape emerging party systems, leaving aside the more

6 E.g., Ecuador, Kenya, Russia, Venezuela.
7 E.g., Peru, Guatemala. Sánchez (2009) calls the Guatemalan party system a party ‘non-system’.
8 Also Venezuela, Peru, Ecuador. In 1990s Venezuela and 2000s Ecuador, party system collapse facilitated the rise of charismatic, media-savvy ‘neopopulists’ who won presidential elections, campaigning on their dissociation from the party establishment and capitalizing on the popular perception of political parties as ineffectual and exclusionary (Hugo Chávez in Venezuela, 1998; Rafael Correa in Ecuador, 2006). Upon entering the presidency, both leaders concentrated power in the face of weak partisan opposition and ultimately dismantled core democratic institutions (Levitsky and Loxton n.d.). Chapters Two to Three and Chapter Seven of this book will suggest that in Brazil and Peru, the contrasting fates of new left parties/coalitions determined subsequent democratic outcomes. Brazil’s Workers’ Party and Peru’s United Left coalition (IU) both formed in 1980. The PT developed within a highly inchoate party system, the IU in a semi-institutionalized system with two major national parties (APRA, AP). Both the PT and IU had popular mass bases, promoted distinctive programs, and quickly came to anchor the left poles of their national party systems. The PT survived its first decade, after which the Brazilian party system progressed from inchoate to semi-institutionalized, and Brazil became a consolidated democracy. Hagopian (forthcoming) identifies the survival of the PT as crucial for the stabilization of Brazil’s party system. The IU collapsed in 1990, and Peru subsequently experienced party system disintegration and democratic breakdown. Lynch (2000) identifies the IU’s failure by schism as a precondition for the election of anti-system outsider, Alberto Fujimori, and the resulting collapse of Peru’s party system and democracy.

Some of the classic scholarship posits, or rests on the premise, that basic conditions such as electoral competition, social cleavages, and certain formal institutions should give rise to strong parties (e.g., Aldrich 1995). Drawing on this literature, a segment of the early scholarship on party-building in third-wave democracies optimistically took ‘party development’ for granted, assuming that parties would follow from democracy, cleavages, or certain electoral rules (e.g., Brader and Tucker 2001).

Yet party-building outcomes in third-wave democracies fell short of scholars’ initial, optimistic expectations. In many third-wave polities, social cleavages, attempts at electoral engineering, and decades of democratic competition did not produce durable parties. The perceived failure of third-wave party-building gave rise to a reverse, pessimistic trend in the literature on party development. Scholars began to identify contemporary impediments to party-building, emphasizing heightened social fragmentation (Roberts 1998), programmatic convergence around free markets and democracy (Roberts 1998), elite access to mass media (Mainwaring and Zoco 2007), and elite access to party ‘substitutes’ such as state resources and business conglomerates (Hale 2006).[11]

Yet neither the optimistic view that parties should emerge under democracy, nor the pessimistic view that the era of party-building has passed, corresponds to the facts. The third-wave party-building record presents considerable variation. On the one hand, in many new democracies, politicians have not invested in parties, despite their supposed utility, and parties have not followed from social cleavages or electoral engineering.[12] On the other hand, 12 Politicians have passed electoral reforms to create incentives for party-building in a range of third-wave democracies, but these reforms have done little to produce strong parties. In many cases, parties have weakened following the implementation of such reforms (e.g., Dargent and Mu‘noz n.d.) and some of the most successful new parties in recent decades seem to have taken root despite prevailing electoral institutions (Brazil’s PT, PSDB, and PFL).

in numerous third-wave democracies, new political parties have taken root.

What accounts for the variation in party-building outcomes observed across the developing world? More generally, under what conditions does party-building succeed?

Defining new party survival

The book defines political party as a group of individuals contesting elected office under a common label.[13] Yet the central theoretical question of the book – Under what conditions does party-building succeed?[14] – does not concern all attempts at party-building. It only concerns major new parties and coalitions: those that, for at least one shining moment, become serious electoral contenders at the national level.[15] To be considered a serious national contender, new parties do not need to win national elections, presidential or legislative. They should, however, be in the running. More importantly, they must win enough elections – at the congressional level, and possibly at the subnational executive and legislative levels – to play major roles in their country’s politics.

New party survival denotes medium-term electoral significance at the national level.[16] The book examines why, among parties that seriously contend for national power, some endure on the national stage, while others collapse. The book equates new party survival with survival of the formative phase (Panebianco 1988), roughly the first decade of a party’s existence. Parties that never achieve national electoral significance do not receive attention, independently of whether they endure the formative phase as marginal actors.

[15] Although some coalitions do not come close to cohering, as coalition elites make no attempts to unify the relevant constituent parties, other coalitions persist across multiple elections, and major elites actively pursue unification under a single party label (e.g., Peru’s Izquierda Unida). The book treats the latter type of coalition as a party, recognizing that ‘party’ may be a slight misnomer.

[16] For a similar definition, see Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck (n.d.).
As a final qualification, surviving party means surviving party, not surviving politician. Parties that depend on a charismatic national leader for down-ticket electoral success tend to collapse or become marginal as soon as the candidate in question exits the political stage. Thus, personalistic vehicles – even long-lasting ones (e.g., Bolivia’s ADN under Hugo Banzer) and previously institutionalized ones (e.g., Peru’s APRA under Alán García[17]) – are not successful parties in their own right.

The book’s central theoretical question can now be restated as follows: Why do some new parties/coalitions that become serious national contenders survive the formative phase, while others collapse after their initial success?

Latin America’s new left parties and coalitions offer an ideal setting for examining the roots of party-building success, both in general and in third-wave polities specifically. These new left parties (tabulated below) emerged during the third wave, a period in which the vast majority of Latin American countries shifted from military rule to democracy. At the end of the 1970s, military regimes ruled all but a handful of Latin American countries, but in a period of several years, nearly all of these regimes fell, some quickly collapsing (e.g.,

[17] In her analysis of party rebuilding after system collapse, Cyr (n.d.) defines party revival in terms of presidential performance, thus scoring Peru’s APRA as a successful comeback due to Alán García’s 2006 presidential election victory. APRA’s electoral significance, however, depends entirely on Garcia. In 2006, APRA won 36 of 120 seats (thirty percent) in Peru’s unicameral legislature. In 2011, APRA failed to produce a successor candidate to Garcia, and the party elected four of 130 seats (three percent). These facts indicate that APRA is no longer a successful party in its own right.

[18] In the 1960s and 1970s, Latin American militaries, backed by economic elites and other informal civilian allies, toppled democratically elected governments and assumed power across the region. Latin America’s military regimes took diverse forms. Some military governments pursued statist and redistributive policies (e.g., Peru under Velasco; Brazil’s BA regime), others adopted radical neoliberal reforms (e.g., Chile’s Pinochet/BA regime), and many sought to neutralize the perceived Marxist security threat through hard repression (e.g., all Southern Cone BA regimes).
Argentina’s Dirty War regime), others gradually liberalizing (e.g., Brazil’s military regime). Several established opposition parties capitalized on the breakdown of authoritarian rule by contesting national power under new democracy. Simultaneously, a large number of new opposition parties – from the left, center, and right – emerged on the scene and became serious contenders for national power. Some of these new parties, from inception, shared the electoral arena with established parties (e.g., Mexico’s PRD). Others were born into systems with no established parties (e.g., Brazil’s PT). A similar process unfolded in the few Latin American countries that had not experienced democratic breakdown during the 1960s and 1970s (e.g. Colombia, Venezuela). In these countries, established parties that had dominated electoral politics for decades began to face serious electoral competition from newer parties.

Scholars conventionally designate 1978 as the date of the third wave’s onset in Latin America. Between 1978 and the mid-1990s, hundreds of political parties emerged and competed in national elections in the region. A few dozen became serious national contenders, and among these, a dozen have survived to the present. Of the twelve survivors, six belong

20 E.g., Argentina’s PJ, Chile’s Socialists, Mexico’s PAN, Perú’s APRA, Uruguay’s Blancos and Colorados.

23 E.g., Venezuela’s AD and COPEI, Colombia’s Liberals and Conservatives.

24 E.g., Venezuela’s LCR and MVR/PSUV, Colombia’s AD-M19 and Partido de la U.

25 The third wave is conventionally dated from the mid-1970s onward globally (Huntington 1993), but from 1978 onward in Latin America (Hagopian and Mainwaring 2005).

26 Bolivia’s Movement toward Socialism (MAS); three Brazilian parties, the Workers’ Party (PT), Brazilian Social Democracy Party (PSDB), and Liberal Front Party (PFL); three Chilean parties, the Independent to the left placing central programmatic emphasis on the reduction of poverty and inequality in the economic, social, and political spheres: Bolivia’s MAS, Brazil’s PT, Chile’s PPD, El Salvador’s FMLN, Mexico’s PRD, and Nicaragua’s FSLN. An equal number of new left parties and coalitions collapsed after becoming serious national contenders during the formative phase: Argentina’s FREPASO, Colombia’s M-19, Guatemala’s MAS and FDNG, Paraguay’s PEN, and Peru’s IU. Table One provides the full sample of new left parties/coalitions born between 1978 and 1995 that received ten percent of the vote in at least one congressional election. Those that have maintained the ten-percent threshold for five consecutive elections are treated as cases of survival, the rest as cases of collapse.

The use of legislative electoral performance, not presidential performance as an indicator of success serves to distinguish parties from personalistic vehicles, at least to the extent possible. The study’s operational cutoff points (ten percent of vote share, five consecutive elections) constitute a reasonable middle ground between higher and lower alternatives that Democratic Union (UDI), National Renewal (RN), and Party for Democracy (PPD); two El Salvadoran parties, the Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA) and Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN); Mexico’s Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD); Nicaragua’s Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN); and Panama’s Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) (Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck n.d.).

27 (Definition from Levitsky and Roberts (2010).

28 Some studies highlight distinctions between Latin America’s major new left parties and coalitions. Roberts (1998) distinguishes between the populist and organic left; Castañeda (2006) between two ‘subspecies’ of contemporary Latin American left parties and leaders, one ‘modern, open-minded, reformist, and internationalist’ (e.g., Brazil’s PT), the other ‘nationalist, strident, and close-minded’ (e.g., Venezuela’s MVR/PSUV); Weyland, Madrid, and Hunter (2010) between the moderate and radical (or statist) left; and Levitsky and Roberts (2010) between left parties characterized by ‘concentrated’ and ‘dispersed’ authority.

29 No party born after 1995, including Venezuela’s MVR/PSUV, has competed in enough successive congressional elections to qualify as a success.

30 Legislative election results may reflect coattail effects, and even if they do not, independently successful party legislators may have a fragile association with the party as such, participating out of loyalty to the leader, or because of the electoral incentives that the leader provides.

31 Some new left survivors (e.g., Bolivia’s MAS) still have not experienced a leadership transition, in contrast to others such as Brazil’s PT and Mexico’s PRD. If a party in the sample had maintained the ten-percent threshold for five consecutive elections but not survived the exit of its main leader (e.g., Bolivia’s out-of-sample ADN, led by Hugo Banzer), it would have been scored as a failure.
do not cohere with our intuitive case-level assessments. For example, Middlebrook (2000: 4) operationalizes party success as twenty percent of the vote in two consecutive congressional or presidential elections, but on this measure, Argentina’s meteoric new left party, FREPASO, would qualify as a success even though it collapsed within a decade of its creation – and just several years after becoming a serious national contender. On the other hand, if one lowered the threshold significantly below ten percent, one would have to treat niche or regional parties as major contenders or even full-fledged successes, as some such parties last for very long periods.

The record of new left party-building in Latin America presents a conundrum. After the third wave’s onset, six new left-wing parties emerged and became institutionalized as major national contenders. Only two solidly right-wing new parties achieved the same: El Salvador’s ARENA (est. 1981) and Chile’s UDI (est. 1983). Judging from the regional literature on the new left, which strikes a decidedly pessimistic tone, Latin America’s new left parties should have fared much worse.

The 1980s produced a set of challenges for left-wing party-building in Latin America. The region’s debt crisis, the implosion of its statist/protectionist economic model, and the simultaneous decline and collapse of the Soviet Union, gave rise to a policy consensus around free markets, or neoliberalism, within Latin America. After the early 1980s, the region’s left parties paid an electoral price for promoting left economic policies, or for implementing them once in power. The neoliberal consensus thus impeded left-wing programmatic differenti-

32 See Loxton n.d.

33 Neoliberalism denotes a set of economic policies, primarily orthodox stabilization and structural adjustment, which are usually associated with the political right and roughly conform to the Washington Consensus (Williamson 1989). Orthodox stabilization encompasses fiscal austerity, achieved mainly through government spending cuts, and anti-inflationary monetary policy, which typically features high interest rates on inter-bank lending. Structural adjustment entails, first, increasing private-sector exposure to international market competition by eliminating protective tariffs and lifting restrictions on foreign direct investment (FDI) and, second, reducing the state’s role in production by privatizing and deregulating industries.

34 Prior to the third wave and neoliberal turn, authoritarian regimes ruled most of Latin America, and large segments of the political class and electorate viewed socialism as a potential alternative to the Western capitalist model. These conditions allowed for the emergence of political parties based on fundamental economic and regime positions, such as opposition to capitalism and support for democracy. In the 1980s and 1990s, however, with government debt to Western lenders skyrocketing, and economic statism and protectionism losing favor as a growth strategy, most Latin American governments turned to neoliberalism. In several short years, governments across the region reversed decades of statist, protectionist, and often highly inflationary economic policies and adopted the major economic reforms – privatization, deregulation, trade liberalization, fiscal austerity, tight monetarism – favored by Western policymakers and intellectuals, promoted by Western governments, necessitated by global market shifts, and in some cases explicitly demanded by Western lenders like the IMF (Stallings 1992). As external pressures mounted and growing numbers of left-leaning voters, technocrats, and political elites came to view hallmarks of the left’s traditional platform as infeasible or undesirable (e.g., land reform, the socialization of core industries), US-
The discrediting of Marxism generated an identity crisis, and also produced new ideological fault lines, within the Latin American left. Forced to grapple with the defeat of revolutionary leftist ideas, many left-wing networks and organizations in Latin America reformed, or renovated, their core beliefs and policy stances, accepting the basic features of the free market and advocating a range of social and economic policies designed to smooth capitalism’s rough edges. Yet revolutionary leftism did not disappear. To different degrees in different countries, the radical left remained a potent force, and internal divisions between radicals and moderates posed a threat to the basic ideological integrity of new left parties and coalitions (Roberts 1998).

The decline of organized labor and rise of the informal sector made popular incorporation and coalition-building more difficult for left parties. As Latin American governments abandoned protectionism, domestic industries folded and shrank, and industrial trade unions, on which left parties had traditionally depended for votes and resources, folded and shrank with them. The shedding of manufacturing jobs, coupled with the general unemployment style capitalism became the ‘only game in town’ (Linz and Stepan 1996). In the new world order of the 1980s and 1990s, however, left parties did not have authoritarian regimes to oppose and could no longer take economic and social policy cues from the Soviet Union, as many had done for decades. Anti-capitalist platforms tended to have limited electoral appeal, and even where left parties managed to gain electoral traction by opposing capitalism, once in government they confronted insurmountable obstacles to sweeping economic reform.

E.g., selective nationalization, regulation, a stronger public safety net.

The informal sector encompasses all economic activity – excluding illegal trafficking – ‘that takes place outside the regulatory norms of the state’ (e.g., taxes, licensing, labor regulations, zoning ordinances) (Cross 1998: ).

By the late 1980s and 1990s, organized labor had become too small a constituency to ground a successful, national party-building project. Brazil’s Workers’ Party (PT) is no exception. Unions gave the PT strength in certain regions of Brazil (particularly São Paulo), but the PT depended on other organized constituencies elsewhere. See Chapter Two. Moreover, the new left often could not count on the support of organized labor, given unions’ longstanding ties to established parties, especially those with classic populist origins (Murillo 2001; Levitsky 2003).
spikes of the debt crisis, caused an explosion of the informal sector. In order to reach this ballooning, atomized social class, new left parties had to make difficult programmatic adjustments. Traditional hallmarks of the left platform such as wage indexation did not resonate with informal workers. Increasingly, left electoral success would require segmented appeals, with politicians and parties attempting to build heterogeneous coalitions of formal and informal workers, as well as rural laborers and middle-class groups. This segmentation would necessitate a careful balancing of interests between distinct, potentially conflicting voting blocs.

39 Informal workers became the largest social class in many Latin American countries, including Brazil and Mexico, the two most populous countries in the region (Haber 2008).

40 Informal workers tended to exhibit weaker collective identities than their counterparts in organized labor, and the geographical dispersion of informal workers often prevented the creation of sectoral and cross-sector associations (Roberts 1998). Thus, although specific sectors of the informal working class occasionally became unionized (e.g., street vendors in Mexico City (Cross 1998)), most did not do so, and there was virtually no cross-sectoral unionization. For a discussion of informalization and collective action, see Roberts (1998: 63-73).

41 Although left parties in Latin America had long possessed ‘fluid, diverse’ constituencies, especially relative to their Western European labor-based counterparts, neoliberal-era deindustrialization amplified these characteristics. The ‘downsizing’ of organized labor and the rapid growth of the heterogeneous informal sector fragmented the left’s potential activist and voter bases. Whereas classic populist parties in Latin America had relied on a central support base (organized labor), the new left could not ‘be defined by its appeal to a core social constituency’ (Levitsky and Roberts 2010).

43 I.e., Brazil’s PT, El Salvador’s FMLN, Mexico’s PRD, Nicaragua’s FSLN (see Chapters Two through Five and Chapter 8). Moreover, numerous new left parties that collapsed arguably faced less extreme versions of these difficulties (e.g., Argentina’s FREPASO, Colombia’s AD-M19).
parties in Latin America focuses disproportionately on successful cases, or cases of survival. While book-length analyses of new left survivors number in the hundreds, book-length analyses of new left failures number in the single digits. In addition, most books and articles on failed cases were published before the parties in question had fully collapsed or even begun to collapse. These non-retrospective analyses typically assumed, explicitly or implicitly, that the relevant parties would survive. Many studies of new left survivors highlight variables (e.g., institutional variables) that also obtain for failed new left parties and hence cannot account for variation. Other analyses of new left survivors leave out or bury variables that do help explain variation, such as mass media access and the party leader’s internal network ties. Without giving attention to cases of party-building failure, we cannot understand the causes of party-building success.

52In the last two decades, political scientists have devoted increased attention to methodological problems associated with small-n, qualitative research (Munck 1998). One strand of this literature focuses on theory development (Mahoney 2005), and within this strand, authors have focused in particular on the problem of poor case selection. Critics argue that small-n qualitative researchers are prone to selection bias and, in particular, to ‘selecting on the dependent variable’, or examining cases with the same value or similar values on the outcome of interest (King, Keohane, and Verba 1994; Achen and Snidal 1989; Geddes 2003). From the perspective of large-n, statistical research, selection on the dependent variable prevents researchers from identifying the independent variables and interactions that vary systematically with change in the value of the dependent variable. This limits the extent to which qualitative researchers, in cross-case studies, can make valid causal inferences. According to Barbara Geddes, for example, selection on the dependent
Moreover, the reliance on single- and two-case studies, as opposed to medium-n studies, has led scholars to provide descriptive, laundry-list accounts, or to emphasize explanatory factors that do not travel across successful cases (e.g., electoral laws, internal democracy).

Small-n studies are also biased toward voluntarism, often assigning inordinate weight to the contingent choices of party leaders.

In short, selection on the dependent variable has caused new left scholars to present un persuasive arguments or underemphasize key explanatory variables. In turn, small-n research designs have biased analyses toward voluntarism and, more generally, prevented scholars from identifying explanatory variables common across cases of success.

Theories of party-building

In recent years, a growing group of scholars has seized on empirical variation in third-wave party systems, or reexamined variation in the traditional party systems of the West, in order to identify explanatory variables common across cases of success. For example, variation on the dependent variable has tainted the findings of many classic cross-case, small-n, qualitative studies on topics such as economic development and revolution (Geddes 2003). In response to this critique, some have argued that the value of qualitative research (e.g., the in-depth tracing of complex causal processes) does not require variation on the dependent variable (Hall 2007). Others have promoted qualitative methods intended to solve the problem of poor case selection. For a review of these methods, see Mahoney (2005).

53 Scholars of Brazil’s PT and Mexico’s PRD, for example, have emphasized the role of electoral institutions, particularly legal registration requirements, in the successful organizational development of both parties (Keck 1992; Ribeiro 2010; Rodríguez n.d.). Keck (1992) writes, for example, that the ‘legal requirements of the new party law passed in 1979 had a crucial impact on the structure of the Workers’ Party and on its efforts to become an internally democratic mass membership party’ (86). Yet other new left successes (e.g., Nicaragua’s FSLN, El Salvador’s FMLN, Bolivia’s MAS), and even some failures (Perú’s IU, Venezuela’s LCR), built strong organizations in the absence of comparable registration requirements.

54 PT scholars and members frequently identify the party’s vibrant, base-level participatory democracy as crucial to the party’s early success. Most new left successes in Latin America, did not have comparable institutions of participation and debate at the base level during early development. For details, see Chapters Two through Five and Chapter Eight.

55 Scholars have partially attributed the success of Mexico’s PRD to the charismatic leadership of Cuahtémoc Cárdenas (Borjas 2003) and the success of Brazil’s PT to leader Lula da Silva’s charismatic leadership, promotion of internal democracy, and emphasis on organization-building (Hilgers 2008; Hunter 2010). Others have retrospectively linked FREPASO’s collapse to Carlos ‘Chacho’ Álvarez’s insistence on rapid electoral growth (Abal Medina 2009), the AD-M19’s failure to party leader Antonio Navarro’s inattention to organization-building (Boudon 2001; see also García et al. 2008), the fracturing of Venezuela’s LCR to founder Alfredo Maneiro’s unexpected death in 1982 (López-Mayá 1997), and the disintegration of the IU, in part, to coalition leader Alfonso Barrantes’s aloofness (Roberts 1998).
to generate and test new theories of party-building. To what extent do these theories, almost all based on non-Latin American cases, shed light on new left party survival and collapse in Latin America?

Institutions and party-building

Literature examining the impact of formal institutions on party development has multiplied in recent decades. Several key perspectives have emerged from this literature. One strand argues that low legal barriers to entry facilitate the creation, or emergence, of new parties (Moser 1999, 2001; Van Cott 2005). On this account, low thresholds for party registry, ballot access, and electoral representation facilitate party formation by enabling new parties to establish a toehold in the political system.

Another strand links low party system fragmentation to centralizing political institutions. Chhibber and Kollman (1998, 2004) argue that in vertically centralized polities, voters do not reward subnational governments for policy outcomes, and subnational elites thus aggregate nationally on pain of electoral marginality (e.g., the US). Building on Chhibber and Kollman, Allen Hicken argues that party system fragmentation decreases in horizontally centralized political systems, where elites have incentives to coordinate with each other across subnational units. Hicken (2006, 2009) attributes the recent, precipitous decrease in 57 Moser (1999, 2001) finds, for example, that proportional representation systems ease party-building by blocking outsider candidates and hence making it easier for new parties to elect a critical mass of national legislators. Van Cott (2005) argues that low electoral, financial, and infrastructural barriers have facilitated ethnic party formation in Latin American countries such as Bolivia and Ecuador, and that high thresholds have prevented ethnic party formation in Peru.

58 I.e., Weakly federalized polities.

59 Chhibber and Kollman (1998, 2004) argue that regional parties tend to proliferate in more federal (vertically decentralized) polities such as contemporary India and Canada. Other accounts suggest, however, that by giving subnational governments policy autonomy and control of state resources, federal systems facilitate party-building by helping nascent parties consolidate at the local and regional levels and scale up from there (Holland n.d.).
Thailand’s effective number of national parties to the country’s 1997 constitutional reforms, which imposed strict penalties for party-switching and created incentives for parliamentary coordination through the implementation of mixed-member proportional representation.\footnote{Thailand’s party system fragmentation decreased precipitously in the late 1990s and 2000s. The PTP (formerly PPP) was born in 1998 and is now the country’s leading national party. In the 1997 constitution, party-switching penalties included laws prohibiting cabinet members from returning to the legislature and laws lengthening the period required to join a new party. The mixed-member PR system, modeled on Germany’s, stipulated that 4/5 of lower-house candidates run in single-member districts.}

He contrasts Thailand with the Philippines, where the party system fragmented after President Marcos’ 1986 ouster and the passage of reforms weakening the national executive (e.g., the presidential reelection ban).\footnote{Hicken’s analysis centers on the presidential reelection ban, which discouraged presidents from investing in parties and, by eliminating incumbency, weakened the incentive for internal and external challengers to coalesce around the president or a single opposition candidate.}

A final strand of the institutionalist literature, represented by Samuels and Shugart (2010), suggests that presidential systems impede party-building. According to Samuels and Shugart, presidential systems weaken parties by giving substantial patronage access and policy influence to presidents, who are not subject to removal by the legislature or, it follows, from their own party (assuming they belong to one). Parties in presidential systems thus tend to be less disciplined, as the executive and legislative wings may clash, and also less autonomous, given their inability to hold the executive branch accountable. For these reasons, presidential systems reduce elite incentives for party-building.

Their merits notwithstanding, the above institutionalist arguments possess two main limitations for the purposes of the present analysis. First, most of them do not strictly concern new party survival, instead examining the causes of new party emergence (Moser 1999, 2001; Van Cott 2005), or of variation in the number of national parties (Chhibber and Kollman 2004; Hicken 2009). Second, and more importantly, in contemporary Latin America, the key variables highlighted in existing institutionalist theories either do not vary across diverse party systems, or appear to distribute randomly across them. Every new left party in Latin America, successful or failed, developed in a presidential system with full or mixed-member proportional representation.\footnote{Mexico’s PRD and Venezuela’s LCR, a shadow case covered in the conclusion, developed under mixed-member PR. The rest developed under full PR.} New left parties have succeeded in both federal (e.g., Brazil, Mexico) and unitary systems (e.g., Chile, El Salvador, Uruguay), in systems with both high (e.g., Brazil, Mexico) and relatively low barriers to entry (e.g., Bolivia), and in systems with electoral rules considered inimical to horizontal centralization (e.g., Brazil)\footnote{On the latter point, see Mainwaring (1999).} Equally, new left parties have failed in a wide range of institutional contexts (e.g., Argentina, Colombia, Peru, Guatemala)\footnote{It should also be noted that, according to a sizable body of scholarship, electoral institutions in third-wave democracies are often endogenous to deeper, structural factors such as authoritarian incumbent strength during the transition. See, for example, Stepan (1988); Garretón (1995); Linz and Stepan (1996); Ahmed (2010); Riedl (forthcoming). Riedl (forthcoming) finds that during democratic transitions in sub-Saharan Africa, strong authoritarian incumbents (e.g., in Ghana, Senegal) imposed electoral rules that ‘[forced]...aggregation into fewer effective parties, and polarization into discrete incumbent and opposition camps’ (viii). Where outgoing regimes were too weak to impose such rules (e.g., Zambia, Benin), party systems remained fragmented.}.

\textit{Access to resources and party-building}

A second approach attributes party-building outcomes to variation in access to resources (i.e., patronage and finance). Most scholars within this approach hold, straightforwardly, that access to patronage, public finance, or private finance facilitates party-building. Shefter (1994) shows, for example, that the founders of the United States’ Democratic and Republican Parties used state patronage to mobilize their supporters and construct national party organizations. Chandra (2004) finds that India’s ethnic parties succeeded where they had enough state patronage at their disposal to attract elites within their ethnic group. Bruhn (n.d.) identifies an association between public finance and party system institutionalization in Latin America.\footnote{Bruhn also argues, more specifically, that access to Mexico’s generous public party fund enabled the new parties to...} Along complementary lines, several scholars have argued that low access to state resources impedes party-building (e.g., Fish 2005). Arriola (2013) focuses on private finance, arguing that financial liberalization has facilitated multietnic coalition-building in sub-Saharan Africa by giving opposition politicians access to business capital and, consequently, the capacity to ‘purchase cross-ethnic endorsements’ (183).

Others hold, however, that access to resources, especially state resources, actually impedes party-building. In his analysis of party non-formation in post-Soviet Russia, Hale (2006) finds that federal and provincial politicians have systematically used the state – and, to a lesser extent, business – as a ‘substitute’ for parties. Hale observes that investing in parties would require Russian political elites to sacrifice resources and autonomy without the guarantee of a worthwhile personal return, electorally or materially. Rather than investing in traditional party organization, these elites have sought to maintain their electoral clout by mobilizing their bureaucratic fiefdoms for electoral campaigns and tapping both government agencies and corporations for money and candidate allies. Hale’s analysis appears to travel to other inchoate third-wave party systems (e.g., Belarus, Ukraine, Peru), where politicians in power have eschewed party-building once in office, instead selecting candidates from within the government apparatus and deploying government workers to perform the functions often reserved for party activists.

Fish (2005) argues that robust political parties did not emerge in post-Soviet Russia, in part, because the state monopolized property, employment, and industry, and would-be opposition parties thus faced an overwhelming material disadvantage. Dargent and Muñoz (n.d.) identify reforms depriving regional barons of access to patronage as a key impediment to party-building in contemporary Colombia. Also see Luna (2010), who finds that access to private finance enabled Chile’s new right UDI to engage in private clientelism and thus to shore up support among the informal urban poor during early development. Along similar lines, Reuter and Remington (2009) observe that in 1990s Russia, governors who controlled powerful provincial machines refused to give up their resources and autonomy to a national party with an uncertain future.

E.g., Presidents Leonid Kuchma of Ukraine, Alexander Lukashenko of Belarus, Alberto Fujimori of Peru, and Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines (Smith 2005: 447), and the leaders of the West African party-states (Ghana, the Ivory Coast, Guinea, Mali) (Zolberg 1985: 94). In Peru during the 1990s, Alberto Fujimori made heavy use of his allies within the national security establishment, deploying the armed
Although the above scholars appear to differ on whether access to resources facilitates or hinders party-building, their arguments can be reconciled. Patronage and finance have a double-edged effect on party-building: access to these resources weakens incentives but increases the capacity for party-building. Thus, it is relatively uncommon for politicians in power to invest in new parties, but when they do invest in new parties the state resources at their disposal can provide the means. Moreover, although an initial period in the opposition is usually necessary in order for office-seekers to invest in parties (about which more later), once a party become institutionalized and wins major positions of power, state patronage and public finance usually facilitate organizational expansion (Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck n.d.).

Most institutionalized parties initially develop with little access to patronage and finance. Indeed, every new left survivor in Latin America save Chile’s PPD spent its formative years in the opposition, with scarce access to state and financial resources. If patronage and finance do not fuel and sustain new parties, what does?

Ideology and party-building

In an important new study, Stephen Hanson posits that strong ideologies are necessary to sustain collective action and produce durable parties: ‘no ideologies, no parties’ (Hanson 2010: xv). Hanson argues that French Republicanism, Soviet Communism, and German National Socialism all facilitated party-building by providing politicians and activists with 70 Politicians in power often, or even typically, invest in new parties for non-electoral purposes like mass mobilization or defense from a perceived threat. See Huntington (1968); Shefter (1994); Smith (2005); Roberts (2006).

71 There are multiple examples of parties that initially developed in the opposition, built grassroots organizations, and, after winning major positions of power decades into their existence, used the state funds and administrative resources at their disposal to continue investing in territorial organization (e.g., Brazil’s PT in the 2000s). See Van Dyck (2014); Van Dyck and Montero (n.d.).
a single, higher cause to coordinate around. These ideologies, on Hansons’ account, gave members ‘long-term visions of the political future’ (xxvi) that trumped their short-term electoral or material ambitions and hence ‘artificially [elongated]’ their time horizons (30). In all three cases, party elites and activists committed to electorally uncertain, poorly resourced party-building projects and stuck it out through thick and thin. Hanson uses the same framework to explain party-building failure in post-Soviet Russia. Largely due to the decline of communism, he argues, contemporary Russian parties lack strong ideologies and, consequently, have not managed to sustain elite and activist commitment.

While Hanson (2010) makes an important contribution by showing that ideological convictions can extend members’ time horizons and fuel activist commitment, his argument – ‘no ideologies, no parties’ – cannot explain most (or perhaps any) cases of survival among Latin America’s new left parties. Although these surviving parties were clearly located on the left of the ideological spectrum, they did not have party ideologies à la the Communists in Russia or Nazis in Germany. On the contrary, given their need to build bridges across different left movements and organizations, and given the global backdrop of communism’s decline and collapse, most of these parties, initially, were left fronts. The FSLN, FMLN, FA, PT, and 72Hanson (2010) states that ideology ‘allow(s) partisans to sustain collective action in the initial phases of party-building’ (xxii). Ideological convictions, on Hanson’s account, lengthen party members’ time horizons by providing them with ‘clear and consistent visions of the political future’. These visions ‘can artificially elongate the time horizons of those who join their cause, making it rational for them to forgo their short-term individual interests in favor of pursuing the long-term benefits available to early converts in the event of an ideological movement’s ultimate victory’ (ibid., xi). Especially under ‘chaotic social conditions’, ‘ideologues will usually be the only political entrepreneurs capable of mobilizing large-scale networks of committed activists’. This is because political ‘pragmatists’, ‘whose political positions...shift quickly along with the rapidly changing political circumstances’, will be especially unlikely to sustain long-term commitment to any particular political strategy (ix and p. 79). Thus, ‘ideological parties in turbulent new democracies tend to emerge as the winners in a process of ‘social selection’ that eliminates their nonideological competitors, which are relatively more vulnerable to the free-rider problem’ (ibid.: 62). To support his theory, Hanson attempts to show that in Third Republic France, Weimar Germany, and post-Soviet Russia – all contexts of relative social chaos – parties with stronger ideologies (e.g., France’s republican party, Germany’s National Socialist Party, Russia’s Communists) were more likely than pragmatic parties (e.g., France’s Orleanists and Bonapartists, German liberal parties, and a multitude of new Russian parties) to build networks of committed activists.

PRD all brought together a range of conflicting left ideologies spanning orthodox Marxism and pro-capitalist social democracy. Each contained major divisions between moderates and radicals throughout the formative phase. It was not a shared ideology that fueled collective action in these parties.\[73\]

In sum, existing theories of party-building offer valuable insights but cannot explain new left party survival and collapse in Latin America. The remainder of the chapter will present the book’s theory of new party survival and failure and set the stage for the coming empirical chapters.

The fragile formative phase

The formative phase is a critical period, or a hump that new parties must get over in order to achieve institutionalization.\[74\] In Latin America, the vast majority of parties that emerged after the third wave’s onset failed within a decade of their creation. Among the parties that survived the formative years, however, nearly all have become institutionalized, surviving to the present day. On the new left, all six major parties that survived the first fifteen years have survived until the present and remain serious national contenders\[75\], some lasting for 73 Hanson identifies ‘the discrediting of Marxism-Leninism’ as an impediment to the creation of successful parties in post-Soviet Russia (xv), but a similar discrediting of Marxism – and the resulting elimination of the perceived communist threat – did not prevent left (Brazil’s PT, Mexico’s PRD) and anti-left (e.g., Chile’s UDI, El Salvador’s ARENA) parties from taking root in Latin America and other third-wave regions.

74 One might call the formative phase a critical juncture, or a relatively short period during which varying conditions across one’s units of observations have important long-term consequences. Critical junctures vary in duration, and the key antecedent conditions during critical junctures range from contingent choices by powerful individuals to structural conditions over which individuals have little control (Collier and Collier 1991: 27). The formative phase of party development is relatively long in duration (five to fifteen years), and the formative-phase conditions for new party survival and failure, elaborated above, are primarily structural (i.e., polarization, low access to state resources and mass media, high access to preexisting organizations).

75 Bolivia’s MAS, Brazil’s PT, Chile’s PPD, El Salvador’s FMLN, Mexico’s PRD, Nicaragua’s FSLN.
In short, the question why only some parties become institutionalized largely reduces to the question why only some parties survive the formative years.

Almost without exception, party institutionalization requires the establishment of a successful party brand, or label. Many institutionalized political parties owe their electoral success, cohesion, and durability, almost completely, to their brand. Very few parties, however, are born with a successful brand. While a small subset of new parties do start with strong national brands and electoral bases due to their prior organizational histories, most new parties must first develop their brands by differentiating themselves from other national parties and politicians and, crucially, demonstrating consistency over some period of time.

It follows that during the formative phase, most political parties are still in the process of growing and consolidating their brands.

As new parties seek to build up and nail down a partisan constituency in the electorate, they almost invariably face electoral disappointments and even crises. New party survival usually depends, thus, on the capacity to overcome these challenges. Grzymala-Busse (2011) has distinguished between regime duration, or longevity, and regime durability, or the capacity to withstand crisis. The book similarly distinguishes between new party survival (i.e., duration, or longevity) and new party durability. New parties tend to fail not because they face crisis, but because they have a low capacity to withstand the setbacks that new parties, survivors

76 FMLN, PT.
77 These include authoritarian successor parties such as El Salvador’s ARENA and Chile’s UDI (Loxton n.d.) and insurgent successor parties such as El Salvador’s FMLN and Nicaragua’s FSLN (Holland n.d.). See also Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck (n.d.).
78 They can differentiate themselves through distinctive policy proposals (Lupu forthcoming), sociocultural associations (Ostiguy 2009), mass party structures (Samuels and Zucco n.d.), and more.
79 The differentiation/consistency framework comes from Lupu (forthcoming).
80 Given the importance of differentiation, it is not a coincidence that almost every successful new party in Latin America began with a solidly left (Brazil’s PT, Uruguay’s FA, El Salvador’s FMLN, Mexico’s PRD) or right (Chile’s UDI, El Salvador’s ARENA) program. For a lucid theoretical account of differentiation, consistency, and brand development, see Lupu (forthcoming).
and failures alike, often face. The theory presented below seeks to explain, fundamentally, why some new parties but not others are equipped to survive crisis.

The paradox of adversity: a theory of new party survival and collapse

Under what conditions do new parties survive? One might suppose that new parties with national ambitions would benefit from access to state resources and broadcast media. Equally, one might think that new parties would fare best in political atmospheres free of violent conflict and destabilizing mass mobilizations. This book presents the opposite argument. Favorable conditions do not give rise to durable parties. On the contrary, adverse conditions are critical for party-building. Most new parties collapse because they do not have strong organizations with committed activists and, consequently, are ill-equipped to rebound from early electoral crisis. Paradoxically, new parties with strong organizations and committed activists are most likely to emerge under conditions of adversity.

Conditions for organizational strength

Organizational strength denotes a mass membership and extensive local infrastructure of party branches and nuclei. In a few historical cases, party organizations have encapsulated their bases, structuring members’ daily lives and personal identities through the sponsorship and organization of everyday activities and the development of distinctive party subcultures (e.g., Europe’s early labor and confessional parties). In the contemporary era, strong parties tend to build fewer base-level offices, recruit fewer activists, and play a smaller role in 81 Some have defined organizational strength as the ‘routinization of rules and procedures’ within the party organization (Levitsky 2003, Krasner 1988, North 1990, Knight 1992), or the extent to which the party organization’s members accept the formal and informal rules governing internal decision-making. Others have defined the concept in terms of value infusion, or the degree to which party members value the perpetuation of the party for its own sake, not as a vehicle for the achievement of some separate goal (e.g., economic equality, a particular candidate’s election) (Levitsky 2003, Huntington 1968).

82 The mass labor and confessional parties of turn-of-the-century Europe structured millions of members’ daily structuring members’ day-to-day lives. Still, they continue to have substantial local infrastructures, large activist networks and memberships, and even medium-sized core electorates (Levitsky 2003: 13).

Strong organizations deliver votes through several potential mechanisms. First, they facilitate large-scale, on-the-ground electoral mobilization. Party foot soldiers can do campaign work, organizing rallies, going door to door, distributing written information, and transporting individuals to polling booths, while local party offices can provide financial, material and logistical support for these campaign activities. Second, grassroots organizations and activists on the ground can help parties disseminate their brand and develop long-term partisans. Third, territorial organization facilitates the capture of subnational office, which, by allowing parties to gain experience in (and demonstrate a capacity for) government, can contribute to their longer-term success. Fourth, party elites can channel patronage resources more efficiently through party activists (Levitsky 2003; Zarazaga n.d.).

Building a strong party organization is laborious, time-consuming, and for party leaders, autonomy-reducing. To begin, top party leaders and local organizers must recruit and formally incorporate large numbers of members and activists. Then, top elites, local leaders, and local activists must house, equip, and staff local offices, establish vertical and horizontal lines of communication across party organs, institutionalize formal or informal mechanisms lives and personal identities, creating entire party subcultures and sponsoring and organizing members’ everyday activities (e.g., youth leagues, women’s groups, sporting clubs, picnics, etc.). See Wellhofer 1979; Sartori 1968; Farneti 1973; Katz 1990; Kalyvas 1996.

84 See Holland (n.d.).
85 Party organizations, in some cases, may provide electorally valuable ‘legitimacy benefits’ as well (Scarrow 1996: 42). A party’s membership statistics may be widely disseminated via mass media; a large membership may act as an effective symbolic representation of a party’s existing or target constituencies; a vibrant internal life may enhance perceptions in the wider electorate that the party in question is broad-based, participatory, and internally democratic; in all these ways, a strong organization can make a party more appealing to undecided voters, thus strengthening its electoral performance (Scarrow 1996: 42). (The content in this footnote is repeated, with minor adjustments, in Van Dyck (2014).) for collective decision-making and conflict resolution, and secure financing for physical infrastructure, communication systems, transportation, and staff salaries, often through membership dues and small donations. These processes take time and, at all levels, require large amounts of volunteer work and the donation and pooling of individual and group resources. As Kalyvas (1996) observes, organization-building ‘does not come naturally or automatically to political actors. It is a difficult, time-consuming, costly, and often risky enterprise’ (41). Crucially, electoral progress based on organization-building occurs slowly. Large activist bases diminish elite nimbleness and autonomy, imposing procedural constraints and demanding ideological stances that inhibit rapid electoral growth (Kitschelt 1994: 225).

Office-seekers only have an electoral incentive to invest in organization if they cannot win office via lower-cost routes, or routes that require less sacrifice in time, labor, and autonomy. Two such routes are (1) the distribution and mobilization of state resources and institutions (Hale 2006) and (2) mass media appeals. Consequently, the adverse and relatively rare combination of low access to the state and low access to mass media creates an electoral incentive for office-seekers to invest in party organization.

State, media, and incentives for party organization

As noted earlier, in reference to Hale (2006), politicians in power have incentives to use the state for electoral purposes rather than undertaking the costly, autonomy-reducing work of party-building. To date, however, few scholars have focused on the positive implications of this insight for party-building. Simply put, because access to state resources weakens incentives for party-building, low access to state resources strengthens incentives for party-building, other things equal. For office-seekers, an extended period in the opposition actually serves as a blessing in disguise. In the political wilderness, individuals cannot tap state coffers and institutions for candidates and campaigners. Effectively, they lack access to a major party substitute – one which has prevented politicians from building parties in numerous third-wave countries.

In the contemporary era, office-seekers without access to the state often do not need base-level organization in order to obtain a mass following. Given the broad penetration of television and radio in most countries today, media-savvy political entrepreneurs can win major elections, including presidential elections, through mass media appeals, with little or no party organization behind them. Moreover, they can do so almost instantaneously, with great autonomy, and with minimal effort or resources.

The rise of broadcast media has reduced elite incentives for party-building and, consequently, weakened or prevented the emergence of strong parties in many present-day polities. Mainwaring and Zoco (2007) find that contemporary party systems are more volatile.

86 In addition, in the contemporary period, high access to the state typically brings regular and extensive broadcast media coverage. Thus, state-originated parties and candidates often use broadcast media to maintain and build electoral support.

87 Hale (2006) makes this observation succinctly: ‘In the era of mass communications and widespread media, it is entirely possible for a party to win office almost solely on the basis of ideational capital’ (i.e., without patronage or organization) (14).

88 Levitsky and Cameron (2003) state that ‘contemporary politicians may reach millions of voters through television and may do so more quickly and at lower cost (in terms of human and organizational resources) than through party organizations’ (24).

89 Mass media also change ordinary citizens’ incentives. In the age of widespread media use, party membership has become less essential for individuals seeking political information or channels of communication with elites. Further, there is evidence that broadcast media consumption causes individuals to disengage from civil society (e.g., local party organizations) (Putnam 1995: 678-80). Katz (1990) finds evidence of these effects, identifying a strong inverse relationship between individuals’ TV/radio consumption and party membership (157).

90 This argument should not be overstated. The growth of mass media has not entirely eliminated electoral incentives for organization-building (Van Dyck n.d.). Party organization continues to give parties an important advantage in local elections, where mass media campaigns tend to be less cost-effective and more logistically difficult: ‘(t)elevision debates and advertisements are more easily planned (and, in the case of paid advertising, cheaper to produce) the fewer the locally based interests to which special appeals have to be made’ (Ware 1992: 74). Moreover, in larger elections, vote-seeking elites with access to mass media have at least some incentive to pursue the additional votes (i.e., the marginal electoral benefits) that result from separate strategies, like organization-building (Sarrow 1996: 36; Hale 2006: 206; Epstein 1980: 375). Still, for individuals with access to media, the marginal electoral benefits of organization-building are typically insufficient to justify the considerable associated costs in time and labor.
than historical party systems due, in part, to ‘the emergence of television as a major actor in enabling candidates to win election... It is easier and – in the short term – more effective to use the modern mass media than to build a party’ (156-7). Katz (1990) observes that in contemporary Western Europe, ‘the party meeting, the party canvasser, the party press [are] all supplanted in importance by the party leader speaking directly to his or her supporters on the small screen’ (146). Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, media-based, personalistic political vehicles have proliferated in Russia, but not a single strong party has taken root. In South America during the 1990s, three new left parties – Colombia’s M-19, Argentina’s FREPASO, Chile’s PPD – rose to national prominence through mass media appeals, with weak or nonexistent organizations. Fernando Henrique Cardoso, leader of Brazil’s PSDB, memorably observed in the late 1980s that ‘a TV channel is worth more than a party’ (Mainwaring 1999: 150).

In short, for individual office-seekers, state- and media-based electoral strategies, relative to organization-based strategies, exact minimal costs in time, labor, and autonomy. These strategies allow for elite nimbleness and autonomy and bear electoral fruit quickly. Consequently, politicians and political entrepreneurs with access to the state or media tend not to invest in mass party structures, instead using state resources and institutions as party

91 Mainwaring and Zoco (2007) also identify the earlier parties’ incorporation of large blocs of new citizens as a key factor. In this connection, see also Coppedge 1997.

92 Landi (1995) similarly states that ‘...television, radio, and the media in general outstrip the intermediating function of the local party organization. [The party activist] has become dispensable’ (211-2).

93 E.g., the Liberal Democratic Party of Russia, Fatherland-All Russia.

94 Hale (2006): 66-8, 81-3. Hale (2006) writes of post-Soviet Russia that ‘with television sets in every home...a political entrepreneur no longer needs a mass organization of the kind traditionally wielded by parties to reach large numbers of voters. Instead, one simply needs enough money to purchase advertising time or a flair for obtaining coverage on television news’ (242).

96 Fernando Collor de Mello, the telepopulist, won Brazil’s 1989 presidential election largely due to televised advertisements, appeals, and debate performances. His flash party, the PRN, had no grassroots structures, although he did benefit from the support of allied right-wing mayors with control over local patronage (Ames 1994).
substitutes or attempting to build electoral constituencies through mass media appeals.

Crucially, politicians and office-seekers who use state resources or mass media to build support tend to rise relatively quickly. As they gain visibility and support, they close their share of the electoral market, eclipsing or crowding out programmatically similar, would-be organization-builders. Ideologically proximate elites and activists who might otherwise have preferred a strategy of grassroots territorial expansion must either jump on the bandwagon of the ascendant state-/media-based party or remain electorally marginal. In these contexts, new grassroots parties do not have the time and electoral space necessary to develop and grow.

Yet where large segments of the opposition lack access to media, the only new opposition parties capable of achieving electoral liftoff are those that build strong organizations. Before the mass media age, externally created parties could not challenge established regimes or governing parties except by building strong party organizations (Shefter 1994). Historical examples of mass-based opposition parties thus abound and span the ideological spectrum. Classic examples include the mass confessional parties of Belgium, the Netherlands, Austria, Germany, and Italy, which formed in opposition to Liberal regimes espousing anticlericalism and their labor-based counterparts, which formed in opposition to regimes and governing parties perceived as hostile or indifferent to organized labor (e.g., the British Labour Party, the German Social Democratic Party).

Argentina’s FREPASO provides a case in point. In the 1990s, Argentina’s FREPASO, a new left party with a weak organization, experienced a meteoric rise, driven almost entirely by several leaders’ – especially Carlos ‘Chacho’ Álvarez’s – mass media appeal (Palermo and Novaro 1998; Abal Medina 1998, 2009). Many Argentine left-wing activists supported the fast-growing, media-based FREPASO even though, in interviews, they uniformly expressed a preference for organizational strategies over media-based ones. One interviewee noted that the only alternatives to FREPASO were tiny, electorally marginal left parties (See Chapter Six).

Shefter argues that parties founded by regime outsiders (externally mobilized parties) build strong territorial organizations based on ideological, programmatic appeals.

In the contemporary era, many opposition parties enjoy access to broadcast media, but not all do. In some of the world’s least developed countries, broadcast media reach too few people to form the basis of a national electoral strategy. More commonly, authoritarian restrictions on freedom of the press foreclose the media option for contemporary opposition parties. These parties must invest in territorial organization in order to contend for national power.

Mobilizing structures and the capacity for organization

Incentives are necessary but not sufficient for organizational strength. Party-builders with incentives for organization must have the capacity, or means, to recruit masses of members and implant party infrastructure in large swathes of territory. The means for organization-building come, primarily, from external mobilizing structures, especially preexisting organizations and movements with territorial reach, large memberships, ready-made organizational hierarchies, cadres of experienced organization-builders, and visibility and legitimacy among segments of the wider electorate. Without access to such mobilizing structures, office-seekers will find it difficult or impossible to build strong party organizations.

Although states sometimes serve as platforms for strong party organizations (cf. Shefter 1994), mobilizing structures for party-building typically come from civil society. His-104 Preexisting organizational infrastructure also facilitates state-building. In his comparison of Italian and German unification, Ziblatt (2006) argues that Germany, unlike Italy, was able to build a strong federal state because preexisting subnational governments possessed ‘infrastructural power’. Infrastructural power at the subnational level made it feasible for the central German state to devolve state functions to subnational units. Italy created a unitary state due to subnational infrastructural weakness.

Historically, mass parties have grown out of civil society actors such as trade unions, social movements, grassroots church networks, and even guerrilla armies. These feeder structures donate vital assets, including base-level activist networks, experienced elites, institutionalized chains of command, physical locales, office and communications equipment (e.g., computers, telephones, fax machines), and vehicles.

A number of scholars thus argue that party-building outcomes largely depend on the strength of available civil society feeder organizations. Kalyvas (1996) argues, for example, that territorially extensive, mass-based, lay church organizations provided Christian Democratic party-builders in Europe with electorally valuable activist networks and vital infrastructure.
Where these church networks existed, strong confessional parties formed (e.g., Germany). Where they did not, strong confessional parties did not emerge (e.g., France). Along similar lines, LeBas (2011) identifies the presence of autonomous labor unions as the key factor determining whether parties with organizational reach emerged in democratizing West Africa. Others have attributed divergent party-building outcomes to crossnational variation in social density generally or to the differential strength of specific feeder organizations such as guerrilla armies, ecological movements and even business conglomerates.

Organizational strength is necessary but not sufficient to equip new parties for survival. To be durable, new parties, even those with territorial infrastructure and large activist networks, depend on high levels of activist commitment. In recent work, Steven Levitsky has argued that settings of intense societal polarization and conflict facilitate the emergence of committed party activists, or partisan ‘believers’ (Panebianco 1988: 26-30), on a national scale.

Conditions of low state and media access select for, but do not generate, committed activists. Parties born in the state attract patronage-seekers. Since media-based new parties can reach millions instantaneously and achieve meteoric electoral rises, they too tend to attract careerists. In addition, they often have an incentive to appeal to the median voter rather than a narrow, radical base. For these reasons, both state-originated parties and media-based new parties typically claim relatively few hardcore, ideologically driven supporters.

Parties born with low access to state and media do not, by and large, attract patronage-seekers and short-term opportunists. Material resources are usually limited and electoral progress is uncertain and slow. Consequently, party elites cannot offer selective incentives (e.g., jobs, salaries) to grassroots workers in the short term. Low state and media access thus weeds out opportunists seeking short-term patronage. As a rule, only ideologically committed activists, or what Panebianco (1988) calls ‘believers’ (26-30), are willing to volunteer their time and labor for a new party with scarce financial resources and weak, uncertain electoral prospects (also see Shefter 1994; Greene 2007).

Yet selection pressures do not generate activists. There must be a positive goal, or cause, for party supporters to believe in and rally around. In Panebianco’s terms, there must be a 114 Exceptions include new conservative parties with strong ties to the economic elite (Loxton n.d.; Luna n.d.).

115 These parties do not become serious contenders for national power quickly. Only by developing a mass membership, large activist base, and territorial infrastructure, and by bringing base-level demands into harmony with broad-based appeals, can they compete at the national level.

116 In successful, established parties, leaders often motivate party workers by providing selective incentives, especially government and party jobs.

117 Shefter (1994) argues that where elites seek to mobilize a mass party and lack access to state resources, they must mobilize individuals on the basis of ideological appeals. Greene (2007) posits that in dominant party systems, early joiners of opposition parties must be ideologues, as only ideologues are willing to engage in party work for long periods despite the low short-term probability of unseating the dominant party. More specifically, in dominant party systems, new parties face a massive resource disadvantage, which greatly reduces the likelihood of short-term opposition success and thus prevents patronage-seeking individuals from committing to the opposition. ‘[D]eep anti-status quo beliefs’, he holds, are a near necessary condition for the survival of opposition parties in dominant party systems (6). He shows that the elites and activists who built Mexico’s PAN and PRD – the country’s two main opposition parties under PRI hegemony – had comparatively extreme policy preferences and ideological commitments.
collective incentive that leaders can furnish, in lieu of patronage, to motivate activists (9). As noted earlier, Hanson (2010) treats ideology as a potent collective incentive, necessary for sustaining member commitment, and hence essential for building strong parties. It is rarely possible, however, to build a territorially extensive, activist-based party organization around a single ideology. In order to build such an organization, new party leaders, in the typical case, must make room for a large number of local leaders, networks, movements, and organizations with distinct ideological, regional, class, and even cultural profiles.

Conditions of intense societal polarization and conflict, according to Steven Levitsky, are more useful for producing large-scale partisan activism. Periods of populist mobilization and counter-mobilization, movements against authoritarian regimes, and life-or-death struggles such as revolution and civil war can unite otherwise disconnected groups around higher causes and facilitate collective action. These social struggles spur heterogeneous actors to join forces, leading to the crystallization of broad, new political identities. In this way, the polarization associated with contexts of struggle can generate partisan believers, or militantes, on a national scale (Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck n.d.).

Polarization and conflict, when violent, also intensify selection pressures (Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck n.d.). Risking one’s life or well-being in the service of a political cause requires extraordinary commitment and belief. Individuals with weak ideological commitments are loath to participate in revolutionary struggles, civil wars, or movements against highly repressive authoritarian regimes. New parties born in these contexts tend to attract individuals whose convictions trump their risk aversion and desire for short-term political or 119 LeBas (2011) notes, for example, that in “most contexts, pro-democracy movements try to incorporate all actors outside the state: inclusion...creates strong tendencies toward fragmentation. material gain. Like resource scarcity and electoral uncertainty, violent conflict thus selects for committed activists.

So far, the section has argued that four conditions – low access to the state, low access to media, access to mobilizing structures, and high levels of polarization and conflict – facilitate the emergence of new parties with strong organizations and high levels of activist commitment. To recap, given the relatively high costs of organization-building in time, labor, and leader autonomy, office-seekers only have an electoral incentive to invest in mass party structures if they lack access to state resources and mass media. Conditions of low access to resources and media weed out political opportunists, selecting for committed activists disposed to carry out grassroots party work absent a short-term material payoff. Incentives alone do not produce strong party organizations, and selection pressures alone do not produce committed activists. Access to mobilizing structures such as guerrilla armies, trade unions, and social movements provide the capacity, or means, for organization-building. Situations of intense polarization and conflict, such as civil war or populist mobilization, help generate committed activists by producing the higher causes, or collective incentives, that spur individuals to collective action.

Without organizational strength and activist commitment, new parties tend to be fragile. Parties without base-level organization (e.g., many media-based parties) depend for their early survival on the establishment of a successful party brand and, where applicable, strong performance in government. If their brand becomes diluted due to programmatic shifts or the emergence of a strong competitor, or their credibility to govern becomes tarnished due to weak performance, they have no organization to fall back on and are likely to fold.

121 (E.g., Argentina’s FREPASO, Colombia’s M-19
122 For a similar point, see Cyr (n.d.).
In parties based on patronage, or on the expectation of short-term access to patronage, party members do not coordinate around a higher cause, but in order to advance their individual careers. Even if these parties possess base-level organization, elites and base-level party workers lack robust commitment. Consequently, individuals within the leadership and rank-and-file are more likely to defect if the party performs poorly in elections (Levitsky and Way 2012).^123^

New parties with extensive, organized networks of committed activists are more durable than their counterparts, capable of rebounding from the electoral disappointments and crises that commonly beset incipient political projects. Driven by a cause rather than a material payoff, party activists in territorial strongholds have long time horizons, which are critical amid electoral crisis. If these parties have a terrible election or spend a long period in the wilderness, activists are more likely to stick it out. Defections are less frequent and severe, and if major defections do occur, outright collapse is less likely to occur, as a core of members will typically remain active, and hardcore voters will typically remain loyal.^124^ In short, although extensive networks of committed activists may impede vote maximization,^125^ they make new parties durable, giving them something to fall back on amid early crisis.

Moreover, since new parties with strong organizations claim local activists and often cannot contest national power in the early years, they tend to prioritize subnational government, seeking to elect mayors, municipal councilors, state and federal legislators, and even state or provincial executives (e.g., governors) in their local and regional bastions. Subnational gover-

^123^ Parties that are organized exclusively around patronage and career ambition may effectively discourage defection during normal times, while the party’s hold on power is perceived as secure. However, such parties are vulnerable to crisis, or any exogenous shock that threatens their capacity to deliver the goods’ (Levitsky and Way 2012: 8).

^124^ In the extreme forms mentioned earlier (e.g., early twentieth-century labor and confessional parties in Europe), mass organization also greatly reduces the frequency and intensity of electoral setbacks; the more individuals a party encapsulates, the higher and more stable a party’s electoral floor will be.

nance allows for greater policy flexibility and experimentation and also, given its relatively small scale, poses less of a management challenge than national governance. Consequently, winning subnational elections gives new parties a valuable opportunity to establish distinctive brands, develop strong performance records, and thus consolidate electoral constituencies at the subnational level (Holland n.d.). New parties with solid local constituencies often retain important subnational executive posts despite national-level electoral disappointments and setbacks. Thus, in the event of national crisis, new parties that have invested in subnational elections and governance are more likely to endure, other things equal.

Conditions for avoiding fragmentation and schism

Although large networks of committed activists fortify parties during electoral crisis, they also increase the risk of schism. Ideological political movements are prone to fragmentation. When factions prioritize doctrinal purity over political pragmatism and compromise, the risk of debilitating schism is high. Consequently, many ideological parties are plagued by sectarianism and internal divisions (e.g., Latin American communist parties). Moreover, it is rarely feasible to build a strong organization without incorporating different ideologies, regions, and classes. For these reasons, avoiding fragmentation and schism is a central chal-

126 Brazil’s PT, for example, used innovative programs like participatory budgeting to consolidate subnational constituencies in different parts of the country (e.g., Porto Alegre).

127 It should also be noted that new party elites, in this situation, can continue providing selective incentives to activists by distributing municipal- or state-level government jobs. The dispensation of lower-level public-sector positions in subnational strongholds may, in some cases, play a minor role in new parties’ survival of early electoral crisis.

128 There are many ways for new parties to collapse. Most cases of collapse, however, fall into one of two broad categories: electoral collapse and schism. In cases of electoral collapse, new parties experience prolonged electoral disappointment or major electoral setbacks and do not recover. In cases of schism, internal conflicts arise, major players defect, and new parties disintegrate as a result. Though analytically separate, electoral failure and schism are often causally related. If a new party suffers electorally, party elites and factions become more likely to split off. Conversely, if a new party loses major elites or factions, it becomes more likely to suffer electorally.
What factors prevent debilitating schisms in new parties, especially those with large, committed activist networks?

In addition to selecting for and generating committed activists, violent conflict, according to Levitsky and Way (2012) and Lebas (2011), can decrease the likelihood of fragmentation and schism within participating movements and parties. On this account, violence between groups creates dynamics within groups that raise the cost of defection. Such violence sharpens we/them distinctions and creates perceptions of linked fate among competing cadres (Levitsky and Way 2012: 871). Defection may come to be viewed as an act of treason at the base level. Group leaders may reinforce social incentives against defection by labeling group moderates as traitors. Where the groups in question are political parties, voters may even punish elite splinter groups at the ballot box, effectively ‘trapping potential defectors within the party’ (LeBas 2011: 46).

To support this argument, both Levitsky and Way (2012) and LeBas (2011) provide evidence from sub-Saharan Africa. Party systems, they show, solidified where regime and opposition engaged in violent conflict (Zimbabwe, Mozambique) but fragmented where such violence did not occur (Kenya, Zambia).

129 In her recent analysis of party strength and weakness in democratizing East Africa, LeBas (2011) emphasizes that ‘[i]t is not enough for parties to win mass support. ... (T)hey must develop means of resolving conflict within their organizations (and) preventing party fragmentation.’ (35). Later, she writes that ‘pro-democracy movements try to incorporate all actors outside the state; inclusion...creates strong tendencies toward fragmentation. For the opposition parties that succeed movements, the challenge is...[to prevent] the defection of elites and constituencies’ (LeBas 2011: 58).

130 LeBas (2011) generalizes that in highly polarized societies, large blocs of the electorate typically identify with one of the conflicting groups. As a result, politicians who run independently of parties representing the poles, or who defect from such parties, are unlikely to achieve electoral success. Polarization thus creates electoral pressure for elites not to defect, even amid internal conflict. She writes: ‘Where party competition is polarized, independent and third-party candidates are significantly less likely to win election battles, and political aspirants are therefore unlikely to form new parties, even if they lose nomination battles. Polarization creates intraparty cohesion by ‘trapping’ potential defectors within the party’ (46).

131 LeBas (2011) argues that despite numerous structural and institutional similarities between Zimbabwe and Although Levitsky and Way (2012) and LeBas (2011) demonstrate that life-or-death struggles can generate cohesion in new parties, many new parties do not develop under conditions of intense, violent conflict but still manage to cohere. For example, of Latin America’s six new left survivors, only two, during or prior to formation, acted as belligerents in systematically violent national conflicts (FSLN, FMLN), and arguably, these two parties depended primarily on their strong electoral brands – which they were born with132 – to avert fatal schisms. The other new left survivors did not begin with strong brands and either did not suffer violence or experienced irregular, localized violence that left the core leadership unharmed. What factors might have prevented fragmentation and schism in these parties?

Indispensable leadership: coattails and unquestioned internal authority

Theorists of party-building rarely take the role of individual leaders seriously, perhaps to avoid perceptions of excessive voluntarism. Yet leaders often have a decisive impact on new parties’ fortunes, particularly in presidential systems (Levitsky, Loxton, and Van Dyck n.d.). Leaders play an especially important role in reducing the likelihood of debilitating internal conflicts and fatal schisms133.

New parties typically lack two features that generate cohesion in established parties: (1) a strong party brand, and (2) institutionalized mechanisms for resolving internal conflicts. Almost all established parties possess a strong brand, which creates a powerful electoral incentive against defection. Elites in established parties know that if they defect and run for office independently, they will lose the partisan vote and probably suffer electorally. In addition, established parties often possess institutionalized mechanisms for conflict resolution. With time, and in response to internal pressures, many parties, especially those with large memberships, develop formal channels for competing interests and factions to promote policy positions and candidates, as well as accepted rules for selecting candidates and hammering out the official party program.

Kenya, only in Zimbabwe did the regime engage in violent conflict with the opposition. The conflict gave rise to intense polarization, ‘empt[y]ing out the middle ground between the incumbent party’ (ZANU-PF) and the ‘primary challenger’ (MDC). In their study of ruling party elite cohesion, Levitsky and Way (2012) reach a similar conclusion, finding that in Zimbabwe and Mozambique, but not in Kenya or Zambia, collective experiences of violent struggle proved ‘a critical source of cohesion’ for Zimbabwe’s ruling ZANU-PF and Mozambique’s FRELIMO.

As noted earlier, a small subset of parties are born with strong brands in virtue of their prior organizational histories (e.g., FMLN). Most new parties, however, do not possess a brand capable of providing strong electoral incentives against defection. Equally, most new parties—especially heterogeneous, mass-based new parties—lack institutionalized mechanisms for resolving disputes. Horizontal linkages tend to be weak. Constituent factions or parties typically have not worked together and thus lack norms of cooperation and established procedures, formal or informal, for adjudicating internal conflict.

A party leader who combines powerful electoral coattails with unquestioned internal authority can generate cohesion in new parties by substituting for the missing brand and conflict resolution mechanism. When a party leader has more external electoral appeal than any other party elite, lower elites know that if they defect and run for office separately, they will be less likely to win, unable to ride on the coattails of the leader. Such a leader—typically a candidate for top executive office\textsuperscript{134}—substitutes for a strong party brand by providing an electoral incentive against defection. History furnishes numerous examples of heterogeneous parties and coalitions whose leaders, in virtue of their external electoral prospects and clout, played crucial roles in preventing the defection of competing elites and factions\textsuperscript{135}.

\textsuperscript{135}These include Charles de Gaulle’s RPF (est. 1947), a big tent party encompassing socialists, communists, Electoral coattails also give the party leader a significant degree of leverage in internal disputes. When the party leader creates a powerful coattails effect, lower elites and opposition factions typically want him to remain in the party, for electoral reasons at least. Thus, during internal struggles and negotiations with the leader, they will be inclined to make more concessions and fewer demands than they might otherwise. Leaders tend to use this leverage, to the extent possible, to shape party policy and behavior as they see fit.

Yet coattails alone are a weak source of internal authority. If a new party leader does not possess any additional source of authority, and must lord his external clout over major wings of the party, he will have a limited capacity to impose on the party during critical periods of internal tension and conflict. In order to remain united during these critical periods of internal struggle, new parties that lack established conflict resolution mechanisms require a leader with unquestioned, virtually unassailable authority. Otherwise, internal conflicts will escalate and may devolve into anarchy, with major opposing players reserving veto power given the absence of a universally accepted arbitration mechanism. A leader with unquestioned authority can step into this power vacuum and serve as the party’s final arbiter, or informal high court, mediating diverse demands and, when necessary, imposing a contentious decision that all accept. In this way, such leaders enable otherwise divided parties, during critical, delicate moments, to move forward with a minimum of coherence and unity, speaking in a single voice.

Where does this kind of internal authority come from? Aside from the internal leverage that comes with coattails, there are two broad sources of internal authority, which are not mutually exclusive or, in some cases, even independent. The first source is strong cross-factional ties, meaning productive, constructive relationships with the party’s main elites and factional leaders. Particularly in mass-based, internally riven new parties, leaders who possess strong crossfractional ties often become ‘indispensable’ (Ansell and Fish 1999). By establishing positions at the hubs of large, complex party organizations, these leaders develop a singular capacity within their parties to balance conflicting interests and broker difficult deals. Since their parties rely on them for unity, these leaders amass considerable power internally. In numerous parties characterized by major internal divisions and weak horizontal linkages, particular elites have risen to the position of party leader due to their strong crossfractional ties: Helmut Kohl of West Germany’s Christian Democratic Union (CDU), Zennady Zyuganov of the Russian Communists, François Mitterand of the French Socialists, Carlos Menem of Argentina’s Justicialist Party (PJ) and others.

In new parties, the factional ties that the party leader brings to the table at time zero are critical. In some cases, leaders have already played active, leading roles in the party’s formative struggles and main feeder organizations. These leaders begin with strong factional

136 If one visualizes a party as a network in which major factions and elites are represented by nodes, leaders with crossfractional ties act as the hub, with spokes connecting them to the major nodes. See Padgett and Ansell (1993); Ansell and Fish (1999); Levitsky (2003).

137 During the 1960s and 1970s, the CDU was riven with internal divisions along several dimensions, including region, religion, and the party’s stance regarding East Germany and reunification (Ansell and Fish 1998: 295). According to Ansell and Fish (1998), these divisions generated conflicts that might have led to major schisms if not for the networking of party chairman and eventual chancellor, Helmut Kohl: ‘The basis for Kohl’s success lay in his remarkable talent as an ‘integrator’ and ‘mediator’... Even before winning the party chairmanship in 1973, Kohl had staked out a role as equilibrator and as linchpin of party unity.... When the party was torn by internal strife, Kohl consistently managed to embody the party itself rather than a tendency or a faction’ (ibid.: 294).

138 Ansell and Fish (1999).

ties (e.g., Lula da Silva in Brazil’s PT).\footnote{See Chapter Three.} Other individuals rise to positions of party or coalition leadership precisely because they lack ties to any faction and, consequently, do not threaten to tilt the internal balance of power in a particular faction’s direction (e.g., Alfonso Barrantes of Peru’s IU).\footnote{See Chapter Seven.} It is generally harder for the latter type of leader to establish strong crossfactionsal ties during the party’s formative years.

Internal authority is not solely a function of the leader’s crossfactionsal ties. It is also a function of the leader’s moral stature among party members. Leaders vary in the degree of respect, credibility, and moral legitimacy that party members accord them. Some party leaders acquire leadership positions in new parties without moral legitimacy among large segments of the base. This may occur most often when heterogeneous new parties purposefully designate a leader who lacks factional ties of any kind. Other new party leaders enjoy broad respect and credibility within their parties. Among these, some may even possess a mystical quality and be seen by party members as central to the party’s identity, or as the embodiment of its higher cause. This kind of stature within a party may be rooted in factors such as symbolic pedigree\footnote{E.g., Cárdenas of Mexico’s PRD.}, acts of heroism\footnote{E.g., Charles de Gaulle of France’s RFP.}, experiences of hardship\footnote{E.g., Nelson Mandela of South Africa’s ANC.}, leadership in the party’s founding struggles\footnote{E.g., Lula of Brazil’s PT; Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe’s ZANU.} and more. Insofar as a leader enjoys credibility, commands respect, or even inspires devotion within his party, he will find it easier to assume the role of internal arbiter when necessary\footnote{High moral stature internally may even facilitate the forging of crossfactionsal linkages. Leaders who seek to build and nurture ties to previously unknown leaders and activists from across the spectrum may be more likely to succeed if they enjoy broad credibility or possess moral legitimacy. Otherwise, the forging of crossfactionsal linkages may prove more challenging and depend on the individual’s capacity and disposition for assiduous networking and coalition-building. Relevant examples include Helmut Kohl.}
In order for leaders to attain maximum authority within their parties, they must possess strong crossfactional ties and high moral stature. If a leader combines these qualities with the leverage that accompanies coattails, his capacity to arbitrate or impose during critical internal struggles may prove decisive in overcoming internal divisions.

Crucially, there is no necessary relationship between a party leader’s external electoral appeal and internal authority (Figure 2). Historically, most party leaders have fallen into one of three categories: those with strong internal authority but relatively low levels of external appeal those with high levels of external electoral appeal but weak internal authority and those who combine high levels of external electoral appeal with unquestioned internal authority. In some new parties, internal authority and the power to provide coattails reside in competing elites: one with the most external electoral clout, the other with the strongest crossfactional ties or highest moral stature. Intraparty tension tends to escalate in these cases due to the existence of two competing power centers.

In summary, new parties with strong organizations and committed activists are prone to fragmentation and schism. While violent conflict can create dynamics within these parties that raise the cost of defection, most new parties with strong organizations remain intact in the absence of violent conflict. This section has argued that individual leaders can function as vital sources of cohesion. Party leaders who combine unique external appeal with unquestioned internal authority may help to bind embryonic parties together during the critical formative period. Because their word is effectively law, they can step in during moments of conflict and paralysis and impose a path forward. By furnishing coattails, they discourage defection and reduce the likelihood of debilitating schism. In this way, strong party leaders may substitute for established brands and institutional mechanisms of dispute resolution during parties’ formative periods.

The role of authoritarianism

The chapter has identified a set of conditions for new party survival: low access to state resources, low access to media, access to mobilizing structures, polarization and conflict.

149 E.g., Álvaro Alsogaray of Argentina’s UCeDé, Gennady Zyuganov of Russia’s Communist Party, Manuel Fraga of Spain’s People’s Party, Schafik Handal of El Salvador’s FMLN.

151 The empirical chapters will argue that Lula da Silva of Brazil’s PT and Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas of Mexico’s PRD both belonged to this category during the PT’s and PRD’s formative phases.

violent or nonviolent), and a party leader who combines coattails with unquestioned internal authority. None of these conditions is necessary for the formation of durable parties, and jointly, they are not necessarily sufficient. Each, however, increases the likelihood of party-building success, other things equal.\[153\]

Three of the above conditions – low access to state resources, low access to mass media, and polarization/conflict – are loosely associated, empirically, with opposition party-building under authoritarian rule. First, new parties under authoritarian rule are more likely to develop with minimal access to state resources. In most authoritarian systems, opposition parties can operate. In these systems, regimes use different tactics to exclude the opposition from state structures. Some simply ban elections. During the era of bureaucratic authoritarianism (BA) in Latin America, for example, right-wing military regimes in the Southern Cone eliminated elections at all levels of government. Uruguay’s Broad Front (FA), for example, spent eleven of its first thirteen years without contesting a single election or occupying a single public office. In other cases, regimes allow elections but tilt the electoral playing field against opponents. These ‘competitive authoritarian’ regimes use fraud, repression, exile, surveillance, financial advantage, and judicial tampering to weaken the electoral opposition and retain a monopoly on state resources (Levitsky and Way 2010).

Second, authoritarian regimes handicap opponents by limiting their access to media. Through various mechanisms, including selective licensing, bribes, sanctions, and outright ownership,\[154\]

\[153\] Specifically: New parties that lack access to state resources and mass media are more likely than their counterparts to invest in organization. If these same parties originate in struggle, they are more likely to have activist commitment, due to high polarization levels, and the means for organization-building, through access to mobilizing structures (e.g., trade unions, guerrilla armies). New parties with strong organizations and high levels of committed activists are more likely to weather electoral crisis. Finally, new parties are less likely to fragment and break apart if the party leader combines coattails with unquestioned internal authority. They are also less likely to split apart if they emerge from violent conflict.

\[154\] Extremely closed regimes (e.g., North Korea, Cuba) make it impossible for opponents to organize.

\[155\] (Elections were banned in Argentina during the late 1960s and early 1990s, in Chile during the 1970s and 1980s, and in Uruguay during the 1970s and early 1980s. The Brazilian BA regime did not ban congressional elections, but it did ban presidential elections from the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s.)
authoritarian elites induce major media outlets to support the regime status quo and ignore or defame the opposition. In Taiwan during the early 1990s, the Kuomintang’s (KMT) control of mass media prevented opposition victories in key elections.\textsuperscript{156} Malaysia’s United Malays National Organization (UMNO) has dominated national parliamentary elections since independence in 1957, due in part to the UMNO’s ownership of major media corporations (Levitsky and Way 2010: 321). Under democracy, opposition parties do not face systematic media hostility. As a result, media-based parties tend to form in democratic contexts.

Third, in some cases, authoritarian contexts give rise to high levels of polarization, conflict, and (less often) violence. Authoritarian regimes exclude and handicap political opponents and may employ violence against them. Political exclusion, hostility, and violence can galvanize the opposition and, especially when coupled with weak government performance, give rise to broad anti-regime movements. Since few regimes practice extreme, nationwide repression, authoritarian rule, at least in the long term, rarely prevents committed political opponents from organizing such movements. Thus, instead of diminishing prospects for successful opposition party-building, authoritarian contexts, by giving rise to mass mobilization, polarization, and conflict, often produce the higher causes and committed activists that are critical for party-building. When authoritarian regimes engage in violence, they may intensify selection pressures for activist commitment and generate opposition cohesion. Under democracy, the political opposition does not face systematic exclusion, defamation, coercion, or violence. Consequently, polarization, conflict, and violence do not often escalate to the levels associated with movements for democracy or struggles against authoritarian violence.

\textsuperscript{156} Media access...was badly skewed: All three television networks, most radio stations, and and Taiwan’s two leading newspapers were in the hands of the state, the KMT, or allies’ (Levitsky and Way 2010: 315).

In linking new party survival to conditions of adversity and (less strictly) authoritarianism, the book breaks with conventional wisdom on contemporary democratization, suggesting that the third wave has inhibited contemporary party-building rather than facilitating it. It should be emphasized, however, that authoritarian rule is not an independent variable. The section has simply identified a loose empirical association between a cluster of independent variables and the regime type, authoritarianism.

After the formative phase

This theory section has argued, among other things, that new parties are more likely to survive the formative years if they initially build strong organizations. One might expect such parties to become organizationally weaker over time, as leading party members occupy government positions, and the party gains traction in the broader electorate, rendering organization less electorally necessary.

Due to three countervailing factors, however, most parties remain organizationally strong or increase their organizational strength after the formative phase. First, even after a party gains broad traction in the electorate, organization-building continues to provide marginal electoral benefits that party elites may value, particularly if the elites in question prioritize lower-level elections. Second, organizational maintenance and expansion become easier over time. Leaders and activists accumulate party-building experience, and electoral success strengthens party finances through increased state funding and outside contributions. Third, the initial period of organization-building may produce internal constituencies that benefit psychologically, socially, and materially from the party organization and demand its maintenance or expansion. Brazil’s PT, Mexico’s PRD, Uruguay’s FA, and El Salvador’s FMLN each have expanded their organizations since the formative phase and continue to enjoy an organizational advantage in large regions of their countries.

Although organization contributes to party institutionalization, very few parties become stable, long-term contenders for national power due to organization alone. Most institutionalized parties combine strong organizations with strong brands. As already emphasized, most parties, in order to develop a successful brand, must initially establish a distinct profile.

157 In some cases, the primary purpose of the party organization may shift from mobilization to patronage. This shift has occurred, for example, within Argentina’s PJ (Levitsky 2003).

158 See Van Dyck and Montero (n.d.); Van Dyck (n.d.).

159 Party leaders also might choose to continue investing because they have paid the sunk costs of infrastructural penetration.

160 On the PT, see Ribeiro (2010); Van Dyck (2014).

161 Neither a strong organization nor a strong label is necessary for party institutionalization. Some parties with weak organizations survive the formative phase and become institutionalized on the strength of their label alone (e.g., Chile’s PPD), while some parties with large infrastructures survive in the long term without partisan supporters (e.g., Brazil’s PMDB, a brandless patronage machine with a larger membership and more territorially extensive infrastructure than any other Brazilian party).
within their political system and maintain this profile over some period of time. Since it takes time to demonstrate consistency, party brands remain relatively weak during the formative years. Parties that survive the formative years, however, tend to consolidate brands, many of which last for decades.

To the extent that a party possesses a strong brand, and hence a loyal partisan base in the broader electorate, elites and members will have an electoral incentive not to defect. Consequently, even though parties tend to lose their initial source/s of cohesion (e.g., violent struggle, a particular party leader) over time, the party brand typically becomes a key source of longer-term cohesion. With respect to durability, weak brands are the main factor that distinguish new parties from institutionalized parties and, other things equal, make the former more vulnerable to collapse.

Case overviews, operationalization, and research design

Chapters Two through Seven will present analytic narratives of two new left survivors, Brazil’s Workers’ Party (PT) and Mexico’s Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD), and two cases of new left collapse, Argentina’s Front for a Country in Solidarity (FREPASO) and Peru’s United Left coalition (IU). This final section presents an overview of the arguments in Chapters Two through Seven and closes with a discussion of operationalization and research design.

Case overviews

Why did the PT and PRD survive, while FREPASO and the IU collapsed? The four cases subdivide into two potentially useful paired comparisons: the PT with the IU, and the PRD with FREPASO. Abal Medina (1998) also notes the striking similarities between FREPASO and the PRD, detailed below.

forces bringing together a heterogeneous mix of radical and moderate left elements. Both were born into relatively weak party systems without a stable left party. Brazil and Peru had similar electoral systems, with presidentialism, full proportional representation, and (especially in Brazil’s case) additional features considered inimical to the formation of stable parties. Both quickly established large activist bases and territorial infrastructures. The PT survived the formative years and today anchors Brazil’s partisan left. The IU split apart and collapsed, defying scholarly predictions. To this day, Peru remains without a major left party.

Mexico’s PRD and Argentina’s FREPASO also have parallel formations. Both originated as left-wing, anti-neoliberal, elite splinter groups from dominant, traditionally populist parties that had adopted market reforms and fiscal austerity: the PRI in Mexico and the Peronists (PJ) in Argentina. The schisms that gave rise to the parties both occurred around the time that the Soviet Union was collapsing: 1988 in Mexico, 1990 in Argentina. Both parties brought together a heterogeneous mix of radical and moderate left elements. Both were born into similar party systems, where two traditional parties had dominated electoral competition for many decades. Both Mexico and Argentina had presidentialism with proportional representation, full (Argentina) or mixed-member (Mexico). During the 1990s, the PRD and FREPASO became the first new parties in decades to challenge the two-party establishments that had long prevailed in their countries. Both parties spent the bulk of their formative years with virtually no access to state resources. The PRD survived early development and, like Brazil’s PT, today anchors Mexico’s partisan left. FREPASO defied scholarly predictions by collapsing amid electoral crisis in the early 2000s. Argentina remains without a major left party to this day.

163 In Mexico, these two parties were the PRI and the PAN, the latter a conservative party that was fifty-years old. In Argentina, the two parties were the Peronist PJ and the Radical Civil Union (UCR), a centrist party more than a century old.

164 Leftist elements (e.g., kirchneristas), however, do periodically control the ideologically shifty PJ.

The PT and PRD have each participated in eight congressional elections. The PT has met the ten-percent threshold in six consecutive elections, from 1990 to the present. The PRD has met the ten-percent threshold in seven consecutive elections, from 1994 to the present. In Peru, congressional elections are held only twice a decade. The IU, created just months after the 1980 congressional elections, only participated in two congressional elections, easily passing the ten-percent threshold in 1985, falling slightly below it in 1990, and breaking apart soon after. In Argentina, congressional elections are held every two years. FREPASO and its precursors (FREDEJUSO, FG) participated in five congressional elections, passing the ten-percent threshold in the middle three, suffering a crisis in the fifth election in 2001, and collapsing soon after.

Paradoxically, the survival of the PT and PRD can be traced, in large measure, to early adversity. For both parties, adverse conditions during the formative period led to the creation of strong party organizations composed of committed activists. Organizational strength and activist commitment enabled them to survive early electoral disappointments and crises.

Specifically, both the PT and PRD spent the bulk of their first decades in the opposition, with few executive positions and hence meager access to state resources. In 1980s Brazil and 1990s Mexico, conservative opponents of the PT and PRD monopolized television and radio, leaving the PT and PRD with scarce access to media. Low access to state resources and media created an incentive for the leadership of both parties to invest in organization, and also selected for committed activists willing to build the PT and PRD from the ground up, without remuneration or prospects for a plum government position.

The PT grew out of the unprecedented mass labor mobilizations of the late 1970s, the PRD out of the mass cardenista anti-fraud movement launched in response to the ‘stolen’ 1988 presidential election. These formative struggles produced the higher causes that spurred base-level petistas and perredistas to collective action. Heterogeneous petistas united around the cause of empowering workers and the popular sectors in a historically elitist political system. Similarly heterogeneous perredistas united around the cause of democratizing Mexico and rolling back 1980s neoliberalism, both to be achieved by putting Cárdenas in the presidency. Both parties built their organizations on civil society structures: new unions, Catholic grassroots communities, and Marxist networks in the PT’s case; the traditional Marxist left, the extraparliamentary social left, and defecting PRI structures in the PRD’s case. Both parties, but especially the PRD, suffered early repression in select regions and localities, which hardened activist commitments. Organizational strength and activist commitment fortified both parties during early development. The PT and PRD suffered abysmal first elections (in 1982 and 1991, respectively) but rebounded due to the persistence of activist networks in territorial strongholds.

The survival of the PT and PRD, however, cannot be traced exclusively to organizational strength and activist commitment rooted in adversity. Given their origins in broad mass movements, both parties were left fronts with high levels of internal heterogeneity. Party leaders Lula da Silva (PT) and Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas (PRD) played decisive roles in preventing fatal schisms. Both leaders combined electoral coattails and unquestioned internal authority. Consequently, they furnished electoral incentives against defection and had the capacity to arbitrate and impose during critical moments of internal conflict. In this way, while the early PT and PRD were still attempting to build strong brands and institutionalize conflict resolution procedures, their leaders substituted for both.

This chapter has argued that (1) a strong organization composed of committed activists and (2) conditions for avoiding schism (e.g., a strong party leader) are critical for new parties. In the broadest terms, FREPASO collapsed because it lacked the first, while the IU collapsed because it lacked the second.

FREPASO’s collapse, paradoxically, can be traced to its advantageous origins. Unlike the PT and PRD, FREPASO emerged and developed under democracy, in a relatively auspicious context. FREPASO spent the bulk of its first decade in the national opposition, with little access to state resources, but the party developed under conditions of press freedom, with regular and unfettered access to the country’s major television, radio, and newspaper outlets. Although FREPASO did not emerge in a context of intense polarization or conflict, party elites did have ties to independent working-class and teachers’ unions that, like FREPASO, belonged to the political left and opposed the PJ. These unions might have provided the organization platform for a grassroots party-building effort, but FREPASO’s leaders, the media-savvy Chacho Álvarez foremost among them, intentionally kept the unions at arm’s length.

Facing a relentless electoral calendar, the top FREPASO leadership calculated that an extensive partisan activist base would take time and labor to develop and, crucially, would demand a radical, electorally suboptimal economic program. Álvarez and his closest associates preferred to target floating middle-class progressives with media appeals, and to tone down the party’s previously strident economic rhetoric in favor of a clean government platform. For these reasons, the FREPASO cúpula completely eschewed organization-building. As FREPASO shot up in the polls, the majority of Argentina’s left elites and groups – including many who might have wished to build an Argentina version of Brazil’s PT – jumped on the FREPASO bandwagon.

When FREPASO, as junior partner to the Radicals, won the vice presidency and a shared congressional majority in 1999, the party amounted to a media-based brand, property of a few dozen elites. Calamity struck in 2000-1, and FREPASO was not organizationally equipped to survive. Amid a violent economic crisis and corruption scandal, Álvarez, in an effort to save the FREPASO brand, resigned the vice presidency in 2000. The gambit failed, and in the 2001 midterms, FREPASO lost sixty percent of its Chamber seats. The brand had stopped delivering, and FREPASO elites jumped ship. With no activist networks to fall back on, FREPASO collapsed in the months following the 2001 election.

The IU, like the PT and PRD, was born in adversity and established a strong territorial organization with a large, committed activist base. After leading extended mass mobilizations against Peru’s right-tacking Morales Bermúdez military government in the late 1970s, the country’s left parties and associated organizations and movements united to form the IU in advance of the 1980 general election, which marked Peru’s democratic transition. The IU remained in the national opposition throughout the 1980s, although coalition leader Alfonso Barrantes did hold the important Lima mayoralty from 1983 to 1986. Throughout the decade, the IU enjoyed little access to Peru’s independent but concentrated and conservative television and newspaper establishments. Electorally, the IU depended on an extensive, primarily volunteer activist base, driven to halt the right’s advances and return the left to power. Although the IU inherited many of these activists from its constituent parties, a large number of independent IU supporters (the no partidarizados) also became active at the base level during the 1980s. The IU, in contrast to FREPASO, was organizationally equipped to endure.

Despite this, the coalition suffered a fatal schism in 1989-90. This schism resulted from coalition leader Alfonso Barrantes’s weak internal authority. IU leaders gave the top position to Barrantes, an independent ex-aprista, in part because he possessed electoral appeal, but also because he lacked ties to any of the coalition’s founding parties and organizations, and hence did not threaten the internal balance of power between constituent parties. Although IU elites recognized, almost universally, that Barrantes stood the best chance of winning the Peruvian presidency, Barrantes, in contrast to the PT’s Lula, the PRD’s Cárdenas, did not possess unquestioned internal authority. He lacked ties to the IU’s major elites and constituent parties and could not claim any special source of broad moral legitimacy within the coalition. Leaders of the IU’s radical bloc (e.g., Javier Diez Canseco), who dominated the IU’s internal organization, openly described Barrantes as a populist caudillo, not an authentic left leader. In the deft, unprompted formulation of one moderate coalition member, Barrantes was ‘accepted as a candidate but disputed (discutido) as a leader’\footnote{Author’s interview with Panfichi.}

From the IU’s inception, Barrantes lacked internal decision-making authority in critical zones of uncertainty. In contrast to the PRD’s Cárdenas, who unilaterally vetoed early calls for a unanimity requirement in the PRD’s National Executive Committee, and who imposed himself as presidential candidate in 1994 and 2000 despite significant internal competition, Barrantes tried and failed (1) to veto the unanimity requirement in the IU’s National Executive Committee early in the 1980s, (2) to ‘tame’ IU radicals on the internally polarizing issues of the late 1980s (e.g., the IU’s stance on the Shining Path and Alan García), and (3) to impose himself as the IU’s presidential candidate in 1989. In the lead-up to the 1990 presidential election, IU radicals refused to grant Barrantes the presidential nomination without a primary, and Barrantes defected to run independently. With the previously united left split down the middle, both Barrantes and the IU performed abysmally in the 1990 election, and the IU dissolved shortly thereafter.

The divergent origins and outcomes of the PT, the PRD, FREPASO, and the IU fit a broader trend within the new left. By and large, Latin America’s surviving new left parties and coalitions developed in adversity. Specifically, most new left survivors spent key formative years in opposition to authoritarian rule, either as new opposition parties (e.g., PT, PRD) or insurgent precursors engaged in civil war (FMLN, FSLN). The PT spent its first five years (1980-5) under military-authoritarian rule. The PRD spent its first eleven years under PRI hegemony (1989-2000). As guerrilla armies, the FSLN and FMLN spent at least a decade under authoritarian rule. The out-of-sample left survivor, Uruguay’s FA (est. 1971), spent eleven of its first thirteen years under military rule (1973-84). In contrast, every major new left failure was born under democracy.

Operationalization

In preview of the analytic narratives presented in the empirical chapters, this section provides scores for each of the book’s four main cases on the theory’s independent and intermediate variables. As detailed earlier, the determinants of organizational strength and activist commitment include access to state resources, access to mass media, access to mobilizing structures, and origins in polarization and conflict. For these four independent variables, the parties receive a score based on the following questions, respectively: Did the party win a major executive position within five years? Were mass media independent and free of systematic conservative bias during the party’s first five years? Did party elites have ties to large mobilizing structures during the first five years? Did the party emerge from intense societal polarization and conflict?

The questions have a relatively short, five-year time frame because office-seekers’ incentives and capabilities in the initial few years almost invariably determine whether leaders will invest in, and succeed in building, a solid, durable organization. Winning a major mayorality or governorship during this time does not provide a level of state access sufficient to substitute for a national party-building effort (although it may be useful in other ways). Parties that wish to become national electoral forces, as all major new left parties did, need electoral capacity across the country, not just in a few large cities or a few states. Only the national government apparatus can substitute for a national party. Thus, parties that won the presidency within five years receive a ‘full’ score for state access, while those that won a major subnational position receive a ‘limited’ score, and the rest receive a ‘none’ score.
Along similar lines, for the mobilizing structures variable, parties receive a ‘full’ score if, during the first five years, party elites had ties to preexisting organizations and movements with national mass memberships (1 member per 1000 citizens), as well as infrastructure in one fifth of the country’s municipalities and, where applicable, in half of its states or provinces. If party elites had ties to mobilizing structures without national reach, but with a major presence in one or a few big cities, or in most of the municipalities of one or two states, they receive a ‘limited’ score. If a party’s elites did not have ties to mobilizing structures with national or subnational reach, they receive a ‘none’ score.

New left parties that initially developed in a context of press independence did not necessarily enjoy a level of media access sufficient for building a national electoral constituency. In countries where mass media were independent but concentrated in the hands of conservative forces, new left parties could not make effective national appeals. Consequently, cases only receive a ‘full’ score on media access if, during the first five years, mass media were independent and free of systematic conservative bias. If mass media were independent but systematically conservative, new left parties receive a ‘limited’ score, and if mass media were not independent, parties receive a ‘none’ score.

Finally, for the origins in polarization and conflict variable, the book distinguishes between ‘violent conflict’ (e.g., civil war) and ‘nonviolent conflict’ (e.g., peaceful, anti-regime mobilizations). Although both types of conflict generate large-scale activist causes, violent conflict produces additional effects on party-building, namely selection pressures and intragroup dynamics that help prevent fragmentation and schism. If a new party does not emerge from either type of struggle, it receives a ‘no conflict’ score.

This section also scores the cases on a composite of the intermediate variables, organizational strength and activist commitment. A party receives a ‘yes’ score for this composite variable if, in the first five years, two conditions held: (1) the ratio of party members to population reached 1 per 1000, and the party established formal branches in twenty percent of the nation’s municipalities and, where applicable, half of the states (organizational strength); (2) the party depended primarily on unpaid volunteers for grassroots party work (activist commitment).

Finally, the section scores each of the four cases on a composite of the party leader’s coattails and internal authority. Party leaders receive a ‘yes’ score if, during the first five years, two conditions held: (1) most major party elites believed that the leader, compared to all other elites, had the best chance of victory in a top executive election (coattails); (2) the leader held a unique position at the hub of the party’s network of relationships or possessed a special source of credibility, respect, or moral legitimacy within the party (internal authority).

Research design

Party-building remains an undertheorized area of research despite the high volume of existing literature on parties. Thus, the book’s empirical research design is mainly geared toward theory generation. Chapters Two through Eight nest four in-depth case studies in a broader, medium-$n$ comparison. The case studies do not test the book’s theory. Rather, they function as ‘plausibility probes’ (Eckstein 1975), evidencing the theory’s initial plausibility by illustrating its key causal mechanisms at work in a few select cases. In-depth, small-$n$ research enables the tracing of micro-level causal mechanisms and thus facilitates the generation of robust theories (Hall 2007). The conclusion, Chapter Eight, provides evidence of the theory’s generalizability, supplementing the four case studies with an analysis, based on desk research, of the remaining new left left survivors and failures and several out-of-sample cases (e.g., Uruguay’s FA, Venezuela’s LCR).

The book’s case universe is restricted to major new left parties/coalitions on methodological grounds. In order to understand the conditions for successful party-building, one should, to the extent possible, compare cases of survival and collapse that differ as little as possible on analytically relevant dimensions, observed and unobserved. Latin American countries are characterized by broad structural and institutional similarities, which include religion (Catholicism), socioeconomic measures (middle-income levels, high inequality), and electoral rules (presidentialism, PR). The region’s major new left parties and coalitions bear additional similarities. As detailed earlier, these parties arose in the same time period (1978-1995) and had to adapt to the collapse of communism, the neoliberal turn, the decline of unions, and the expansion of the atomized informal working class. Despite these and other similarities, Latin America’s new left parties vary on the outcome of interest, survival. Thus, they may be treated as ‘most similar’ cases.

Chapters Two through Seven draw on data from 13-14 months of interviews and archival research in São Paulo, Campinas, and Brasília, Brazil; Mexico City, Mexico; Lima, Peru; and Buenos Aires, Argentina. I conducted eighty-five interviews with party elites, party activists, party observers, and country-based scholars and examined over 1000 documents from official party archives, newspaper archives, and interviewees’ personal archives. The empirical chapters draw on numerous additional sources, including dozens of published interviews with party members\(^\text{166}\) retrospective first-hand testimonies\(^\text{167}\) and detailed scholarly analyses conducted by party members\(^\text{168}\).

To score the cases on independent and intervening variables, the chapters draw heavily on expert country analyses, especially first-hand accounts and analyses, as well as interviews (especially for the leadership variables). The most useful sources included Meneguello (1989), Keck (1992), Ribeiro (2010), Secco (2011), and Rodríguez (n.d.) for the PT; Bruhn (1998), Borjas (2003), Martínez (2005), and Rodríguez (n.d.) for the PRD; Novaro and Palermo (1998) and Abal Medina (2009) for FREPASO; and Cameron (1994), Roberts (1998), Herrera (2002), and Adrianzén (ed.) (2011) for the IU.

While first-hand accounts/analyses and secondary materials furnished most of the evidence necessary for scoring variables, interviews and archives provided most of the evidence necessary for demonstrating causal mechanisms, or the relationships between variables. Interviews present methodological challenges, as ideas and events that may not have seemed important to participating actors in the moment (e.g., a party’s reliance on mass media or quick access to state resources) might come to seem important in retrospect. For this reason, it is crucial, in interviews, to pose general, open-ended questions and listen for unprompted statements, in order to avoid implanting ideas in the interviewee’s mind.

Yet the validity of interview evidence also depends on repetition across a diverse range of interviews. Insofar as multiple interviewees with different beliefs and loyalties (e.g., radicals v. moderates in a particular party) independently confirm that a particular meeting occurred, or that a particular line of thought prevailed among the party elite or activist base, one can be confident that the interviewees have not confabulated or provided idiosyncratic, unrepresentative interpretations of events.

Still, no interviewing technique can wholly circumvent the problem of hindsight. Thus, archives are an invaluable source of field evidence. Unlike interviews, archives reveal what participants and observers thought and expressed in real time, before they knew how events would ultimately unfold. The PT chapters draw extensively on materials from the Perseu

169 As an illustration, in Mexico, PRI operatives murdered hundreds of PRD activists during the late 1980s and early to mid-1990s, and scholars such as Greene (2007) and Rodríguez (n.d.) have posited, with evidence, that these repressive conditions selected for ideological activists and elites. Yet no existing studies explore the collective psychological effects of PRI violence on local networks of perredistas. When asked to describe the PRD’s reaction to the electoral crises of 1991 and 1994, one party activist from San Luis Potosí, without any previous mention of PRI violence, stated, ‘we were at war’. This provided a small bit of evidence that, at the base level, PRI hostility and violence sharpened PRI/PRD boundaries and hardened perredistas’ collective identity.

170 If, for example, only a lone, radical interviewee had highlighted the toxic relationship between Alfonso Barrantes and IU radicals, Chapter Seven could not, with justification, have characterized Barrantes’ crossfactional ties as weak. Yet since several interviewees offered the same assessment, and most of them generally supported Barrantes, the characterization has a relatively solid basis.

171 Official PT archives from the 1980s, for example, provide in-the-moment evidence that low access to media contributed to organization-building, as party organizers, in their campaign manuals and pamphlets, exhorted activists to donate time and resources given the PT’s resource disadvantage and the opposition of the conservative media establishment (Chapter Two).
Abramo Foundation’s Sérgio Buarque de Holanda Center: Documentation and Political Memory, and from the Edgar Leuenroth Archive at the University of Campinas. The PRD chapters rely heavily on articles published in the Mexican weekly magazine, Proceso. All Proceso excerpts were originally cited in Borjas (2003) unless otherwise noted. The FREPASO chapter makes extensive use of Marcos Novaro’s valuable personal archive. Finally, the Peru chapter draws heavily on articles published in the Peruvian monthly magazine, Quehacer.

The rest of the book is organized as follows. Chapters Two and Three analyze the survival of Brazil’s PT, while Chapters Four and Five analyze the survival of Mexico’s PRD. The two pairs of chapters have the same analytical structure. Chapters Two and Four show that for the PT (Chapter Two) and PRD (Chapter Four), early adversity led to the creation of a strong party organization composed of committed activists, and that organization and activist commitment enabled the survival of early electoral crisis. Chapters Three and Five argue that by combining coattails and unquestioned internal authority, Lula da Silva (Chapter Three) and Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas (Chapter Five) substituted for strong brands and institutionalized conflict resolution procedures and thus prevented fragmentation within the early PT and PRD.

Chapters Six and Seven analyze the collapses of Argentina’s FREPASO and Peru’s IU, respectively. Chapter Six shows that FREPASO’s elite founders rose to national prominence through mass media appeals, did not have an incentive to invest in grassroots organization, and were not organizationally equipped to survive the electoral crisis of the early 2000s. Chapter Seven argues that within the IU, Alfonso Barrantes furnished coattails but did not possess unquestioned authority and thus could not veto constraining decision rules, arbitrate internal conflict, or ultimately even impose himself as candidate. These facts, the chapter shows, prompted his exit and the IU’s fatal schism.
The conclusion, Chapter Eight, summarizes the book’s argument, explicitly compares the PT, PRD, FREPASO, and IU to each other, applies the book’s argument to the broader set of new left cases and a few shadow cases, and discusses research implications.
Chapters Two and Three analyze the survival of Brazil’s Workers’ Party (PT). Founded in 1980, the PT has contended for national power in Brazil since the late 1980s. Petistas have held ten governorships and nearly two-thousand mayoralties, including São Paulo’s. The party has elected at least ten percent of Brazil’s federal deputies in every congressional election since 1990. In recent years, the PT has consolidated its position as Brazil’s leading party, retaining the presidency in 2006 and 2010 after party leader Lula da Silva’s first successful presidential bid in 2002. Given Brazil’s size, economic strength, and growing presence on the global stage, the PT is not just the most important new party in Latin America, but among the most important in the world.

Dozens of scholars have studied the PT in depth. The bulk of existing literature either examines why the PT successfully ‘adapted’, moderated, and reached the presidency during the 1990s and 2000s, or investigates the causes and effects of well-known PT institutions, governing practices, and policies such as early internal democracy, participatory budgeting in municipal government, and the Bolsa Família conditional cash transfer program. Chapters Two and Three do not directly concern any of these issues. Instead of asking why the PT adapted and reached the presidency, or why the PT has adopted certain distinctive practices and policies, the chapters ask a more basic question: Why did the PT survive and become institutionalized as a major national party in Brazil?
Chapter 2  Building the PT: adversity and survival

‘The weapons of power are armies, money, and information.’
– Slogan on PT flier, undated

The PT survived because of early adversity, not in spite of it.

The PT originated in mass struggle against Brazil’s military regime (1964-85). The PT’s founders belonged to and drew from three social forces that played central, collaborative roles in this struggle: the organized Marxist left, the grassroots Catholic left, and above all the autonomous new union movement. The new unions and their civil society allies on the Catholic and Marxist left conceived the PT as a partisan vehicle for democratic and socialist transformation.

In order to effect change in the institutional sphere, the PT, at a minimum, would have to achieve electoral success at the national level. Yet the early PT lacked access to finance and patronage. With no ties to the economic elite, and with federal laws banning union donations, the PT, from inception, would fundamentally depend on public resources. Public resources, however, proved scarce. Not until 1989, when Luiza Erundina assumed the São Paulo mayoralty, did the PT occupy its first major executive position.

The early PT also lacked access to media. Under military rule and the early Nova República, the PT confronted a powerful mass media establishment dominated by the Globo network and both closed and opposed to the left opposition. Major news outlets denied the PT access, circulated open propaganda, and systematically omitted and edited news coverage to the PT’s detriment.

1From Edgar Leuenroth archive.
Low access to state resources and media created an incentive for PT elites to invest in organization. Unable to reach voters through media or attract activists and supporters with salaries, petty clientelism, and promises of patronage, the PT could only contend for national power if it developed a large, volunteer organization and, through it, distributed collective incentives to the broader population. PT leaders understood this. In campaign materials and internal strategic discussions, party leaders repeatedly emphasized, to each other and to the rank-and-file, that they depended on activists to deliver the unfiltered party message to would-be supporters.

Elite incentives were insufficient for the creation of a strong PT organization. Party founders also had to be capable of large-scale organization-building. The PT’s capacity for organization-building came from founders’ origins, linkages, and support in civil and political society, primarily the new unionism, Catholic left, and Marxist left. Lacking the resources and institutional capacity to finance or administer large-scale territorial implantation from the top down, the national PT organization depended on the bottom-up initiative and dispersed human, material, and infrastructural resources of these civil society feeder organizations.

Thus, low access to material resources and media made organization-building electorally imperative, while the PT leadership’s origins and linkages in civil society made organization-building possible. Yet the PT depended on one more vital ingredient: activist commitment based on belief in a higher cause.

Individuals do not engage in time-consuming, labor-intensive, unremunerated, and sometimes risky partisan activism unless driven by a higher cause. The PT’s higher cause went beyond opposition to military rule. Leaders branded the PT, and the rank-and-file viewed the PT, as a novelty in Brazilian history: the first authentically popular expression in a society perpetually dominated by elites. It was this narrative of popular struggle, which Lula and other new unionist party leaders embodied, that inspired thousands of local civil society leaders and activists to build the PT organization from the ground up.

During its formative period, the PT far surpassed the organizational requirements imposed by law. Petistas built the most internally vibrant of Brazil’s major parties, with the largest volunteer activist base and one of the largest territorial infrastructures. Despite slow early growth and major initial setbacks (e.g., the 1982 elections), local activist networks in the PT’s core bastions persisted, rebounded, and, together with party leaders, continued to invest in PT-building, new union-building, and the broadening of PT/civil society linkages.

Organizational strength and activist commitment thus fortified the PT, enabling the party to survive a slow, often disappointing formative phase. By the late 1980s, the PT had consolidated Brazil’s dominant partisan brand on the left and become institutionalized as a major national party.

Setting the stage: military rule and the genesis of the Workers’ Party

The Brazilian military seized power in 1964 with economic growth slowing, inflation and debt rising, worker and peasant mobilization intensifying, and – within the military – fear of Marxist insurgency mounting due to the radicalization of organized labor, the formation of urban and rural guerrilla groups within Brazil, and the recent consolidation of Marxist rule in Cuba.

National security ‘hard-liners’ and economic statists controlled Brazil’s military regime for most of the first decade of military rule (1964-74). Early regime technocrats viewed economic progress and social order as mutually reinforcing (Stepan 1971, 1973 (ed.); Moreira Alves

2In their forcible takeover, Brazil’s military golpistas enjoyed support from key societal and political actors/blocs, including most of the business class and rural landowning elite, numerous governors, much of the national media establishment, and segments of the middle class that prioritized the restoration of social order and resolution of Brazil’s fiscal and economic troubles over democratic stability.
1988; Skidmore 1988). While social order would provide a secure platform for economic growth, broad-based material progress would mitigate and preempt social unrest, violent opposition, and other forms of instability.

In order to restore and sustain social order, early military governments adopted a multi-pronged approach, restricting political contestation and protest, repressing left ‘subversives’, and actively attempting to unify the general public around regime ideology. The first military government of Castelo Branco (1964-7), by executive decree, imposed the basic authoritarian system that would last until the early 1980s. Shortly after inauguration, the government expelled influential opposition figures from political life and canceled the 1965 presidential elections. Following a strong opposition showing in the direct gubernatorial elections of 1965, the Castelo Branco government banned all existing parties and created an official two-party system composed of the situacionista (ruling) ARENA and oposicionista Brazilian Democracy Movement (MDB). ARENA and the MDB would remain Brazil’s only legal parties until the liberalization of the party system in 1979.

The country’s two most hard-line military governments – under Presidents Costa e Silva (1967-9) and Médici (1969-74) – employed heavy repression in order to defeat ‘subversives’. From the late-1968 passage of the Fifth Institutional Act until the mid-1970s – a period

3These included former president Juscelino Kubitschek.
4The Castelo Branco government also intervened in hundreds of unions, banning strikes.
5Opposition parties won in Minas Gerais and Guanabara, a former state encompassing modern-day Rio de Janeiro.
6The Castelo Branco government also circumscribed the functions of the national legislature, expanded the decree-making powers of the presidency, and made the 1970 gubernatorial elections indirect. (Because the constitution stipulated direct gubernatorial elections, military governments could only impose indirect elections via executive decree.) The Castelo Branco government also outlawed direct elections of mayors, authorizing governors to appoint mayors instead. Government lawyers would incorporate many of these reforms into the military’s 1967 Constitution.
7Costa e Silva’s term (1967-9) gave rise to the first serious outbreak of hostilities between the military regime and its opponents, but national security ‘took center stage’ during the Médici years (1969-74). During Costa e Silva’s term, the Revolutionary Popular Vanguard (VPR) perpetrated a fatal, military-directed known as the Anos de Chumbo, or ‘Lead Years’ – Brazilian military and police murdered or ‘disappeared’ between 100 and 500 individuals and committed other forms of repression on a much larger scale, arresting approximately 50,000 individuals, torturing 20,000, exiling 10,000, and suspending the political rights of (cassando) 5000 (Chiavenato 1997: 131; Keck 1992: 52). Both governments primarily targeted the Marxist left[8] which encompassed urban guerilla cells (responsible for dozens of bank robberies and kidnappings)[9], rural guerrilla forces[10], clandestine parties and political organizations, and radical intellectuals and opinion-makers. From the hard-line military perspective, the Marxist left posed a range of threats to national security, from ‘terrorism’ and armed revolution to the radicalization, infiltration, and mobilization of civil society, especially organized labor.

In order to win the ‘battle of ideas’, Brazil’s military rulers attempted, from the beginning, to unify the general public around regime ideals and goals – in Amaral and Guimarães’ (1994) words, ‘to guarantee national unity and the massification of the ideology of national security’ car bomb attack, and the police killed a student protester in Rio de Janeiro, triggering a mass protest in Rio, the (Passeata Cem Mil). Amid growing opposition to state repression among MDB legislators (e.g., Márcio Moreira Alves), Costa e Silva’s National Security Council penned the Fifth Institutional Act (AI-5), empowering the federal executive to close the national legislature, remove elected officials, and use repression to limit political forms of expression and association. Following AI-5’s passage in December of 1968, the Costa e Silva government tightened authoritarian controls and began to create a ‘culture of fear’ through coercion and violence. The administration closed Brazil’s congress for nearly a year, passed and enforced strict censorship laws, and began to target ‘subversives’ with a range of violent and repressive measures, from exile and suspensions of political rights (cassações) to detentions, torture, and disappearances (Moreira Alves 1988).

[8] The Brazilian Human Rights Commission and Amnesty Commission have estimated 333 and 457, respectively. Other sources estimate between 100 and 200 (CITATION NEEDED).

[9] In their use of cassações and forced exile, hard-line governments also targeted less radical individuals considered dangerous due to their social or political influence. These included political and cultural elites such as Juscelino Kubitschek, Gilberto Gil, Caetano Veloso, and many more.

[10] Several of Brazil’s most well-known urban guerrillas, including Carlos Marighella and Carlos Lamarca, died in armed exchanges with police in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

[11] In 1972-3, the Brazilian military engaged and defeated the rural guerrilla force, the Guerrilha do Araguaia (Pará), resulting in scores of casualties (CITATION). The Guerrilha’s leaders modeled the force on the Chinese Revolution and had close ties to the PCdoB (Rodríguez n.d.: 142). With approximately eighty members, the Guerrilha was the strongest domestic insurgency in Brazil during the Cold War period.
In pursuit of national integration and cultural homogenization, early military governments created Brazil’s first public telecommunications companies, Embratel (est. 1965) and Telebrás (est. 1972), and actively promoted the monopolization of Brazil’s private media market, singling out the pro-regime TV Globo for ‘special favor’ in the all-important, fast-growing television sector (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 32).

In 1970, the Médici government canceled the broadcasting license of the Excelsior television network, which had opposed the 1964 coup. The most overt attempts at top-down ideological indoctrination came in the early 1970s, when the Médici government sought to popularize nationalist, anti-opposition slogans such as ‘Brazil: Love it or Leave it’ and ‘If you don’t live to serve Brazil, you don’t serve to live in Brazil’. The federal government produced and circulated hundreds of thousands of bumper stickers with such slogans, while business allies placed the slogans on their products, and governista media networks (most importantly TV Globo) broadcast them.

In the economic domain, Brazil’s hard-line military governments, in contrast to their Chilean and Argentine counterparts, systematically deepened the state’s role in private and public industrial production (Skidmore 1988) and made massive, long-term investments in infrastructure, higher education, and the public safety net (Weyland 1994). After the Castelo Branco government (1964-7) stabilized the Brazilian economy, improved the fiscal outlook, and neutralized organized labor, the successor governments of Costa e Silva and Médici,

15 In order to curb inflation and ballooning public debt, which had partially motivated the 1964 military coup, the Castelo Branco government passed a set of orthodox stabilization measures, issuing a new currency (the cruzeiro novo), imposing strict monetary controls, implementing tax reforms designed to increase revenue, selectively cutting the budget and downsizing the public sector, and placing a set of constraints on organized labor intended to increase the efficiency of public and private corporations (e.g., bureaucratic reorganization, wage compressions, removal of employment guarantees). With respect to under the stewardship of powerful finance minister Delfim Netto (1967-74), aggressively promoted infrastructural and human capital development and ‘doubled down’ on public and private domestic production in sectors ranging from natural resource extraction to complex, high-end manufacturing.

These governments ramped up funding for university research, provided critical financial support to fledgling private industries, poured resources into core primary-sector public companies (Petrobrás, Vale do Rio Doce), and – seeking to ‘move up the value chain’ – founded ambitious new public companies such as Embraer (aerospace/defense, est. 1969).16 In the early 1970s, the Médici government undertook a series of ‘pharaonic’ infrastructural projects, including the construction of the Itaipú hydroelectric dam, Transamazônica highway, and the country’s first nuclear plant in Angra dos Reis, Rio de Janeiro.

From the late 1960s to the mid-1970s, the Brazilian economy grew at a dizzying pace. The Costa e Silva years (1967-9) saw a near two-fold increase in the rate of economic growth. The Médici years (1969-74) brought an economic ‘miracle’ in which national income grew at an average of roughly ten percent, and tens of millions of Brazilians entered the middle class. Aided by increased tax revenues, the combined product of robust growth and Castelo Branco-era tax reforms, the Médici government implemented the most significant social policy expansions since the Vargas era, investing heavily in Brazil’s higher education system and, in 1971, extending pension coverage to rural workers and domestic servants, two important and previously excluded occupational categories (Weyland 1994).

In 1972-3, however, Brazil’s economy slowed and ground to a halt. In 1972, the Médici bureaucratic reorganization, in 1966 the Castelo Branco government, as part of an effort to neutralize organized labor, replaced the previous patchwork of sector-specific administrative agencies (IAPs) with a single administrative body, the INPS. The government also implemented modest industrial reforms, increasing support for public and private domestic industries and providing financial incentives for foreign industries to invest in Brazil.

government postponed direct gubernatorial elections until 1978, ‘[foreseeing] probable defeat in important states’ in the 1974 election (Skidmore 1988: 150). No longer bolstered by a boom, the hard-line military elite began to lose support, especially among the middle sectors opposed to the repression, censorship, and electoral exclusion of the Lead Years. Consequently, the military’s internal balance of power shifted toward soft-liners. The March 1974 inauguration of Brazil’s fourth military government, headed by Petrobrás president General Ernesto Geisel, ushered in a less repressive, authoritarian phase of military rule. The Geisel government initiated a ‘slow, gradual, and safe’ political ‘opening’ (abertura), defined by an ‘easing’ of repression and electoral exclusion (distensão). The Geisel government allowed free electoral advertisements on television and radio and began an attempt to co-opt civil society opponents into the institutional sphere (von Mettenheim 1995: 100).

In the November 1974 congressional election, however, the MDB surged and nearly defeated the ruling ARENA, provoking a short-term hard-line retrenchment. In 1975-6, the Geisel government escalated its use of repression. Detentions spiked, new disappearances came to light, and police committed two notorious, high-profile murders in São Paulo, killing opposition journalist Vladimir Herzog (October 1975) and autonomous metalworker Manoel Fiel Filho (January 1976). The Geisel government also formally restricted political parties’ media access. The Lei Falcão, passed in July 1976, prohibited political debates/advertisements on television/radio and only allowed parties, during official campaign season, to display photos of their candidates (Secco 2011: 81).

Authoritarian retrenchment did not serve the military’s goals. Political and societal opposition continued to intensify, such that by early 1977, the Geisel government foresaw major potential losses in the direct gubernatorial elections of 1978. While ‘dialing down’ its use of hard repression, the Geisel government closed the national congress in early 1977 and passed the ‘April Package’ (Pacote de Abril), a set of executive decrees making the 1978 gubernatorial elections indirect, strengthening ARENA’s presence in the national congress, and extending presidential terms to six years.

Due to a combination of long- and short-term factors, opposition to military rule, by the late 1970s, had broadened and coalesced into a national movement (Moreira Alves 1988). Despite renewed economic growth and social policy expansion under Geisel\(^{19}\) tens of millions of Brazilians had not participated meaningfully in, or benefited significantly from, the country’s material advances under military rule. In fact, poverty and inequality had deepened. Lower-class wages had not kept apace with inflation, leading to reductions in the real income levels of the urban poor. Vertiginous economic growth at the ‘top’ had widened the notorious chasm between Brazil’s upper and lower classes. Rapid urbanization and the deepening of poverty had exacerbated problems of unemployment, crime, malnutrition, overcrowding, and inadequate infrastructure in the favelas of major cities (e.g., São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro).

The problems of poverty, inequality, and urban dysfunction, coupled with the memory of the Médici years, recent galvanizing incidents such as the Herzog and Fiel Filho murders, and the continued denial of basic democratic freedoms, provided ideological fuel for the regime opposition as the second half of the 1970s progressed. Equally, the diminution and eventual elimination of hard repression under Geisel lowered the cost of open dissent, causing many exiles to return to Brazil and leading relatively moderate or risk-averse individuals to participate in the growing opposition movement.

The balance of power between regime and opposition only shifted decisively, however, with \(^{19}\) Robust economic growth persisted under Geisel, such that by 1980, the Brazilian economy had more than tripled in size since 1967 (in inflation-adjusted 1980 reais [www.ipeadata.gov.br]). The Geisel government also implemented a new set of broad-based social policies, including progressive tax reform, the universal extension of emergency health care, and the extension of basic health care to the rural poor.

the rise of Brazil’s autonomous union movement. Industrial and economic development during the 1960s and 1970s brought a major increase in the size of Brazil’s public and private workforces, across the primary, industrial, and service sectors. From 1960 to 1978, the number of unionized workers shot from 1.5 million to over 10 million (Keck 1992: 13). Because the late Médici and Geisel governments rolled back some of the most draconian wage and employment tenure policies of the hard-line era, Brazilian organized labor, even the more autonomous sectors, initially remained on the ‘sidelines’ of the opposition movement. Yet in late 1977, a World Bank study revealed that the Médici government had ‘doctored’ inflation figures in 1973, dramatically underreporting the rising cost of food, housing, and other core goods and services in order to keep workers’ indexed wages low in real terms.20

The revelation, publicly confirmed by the Geisel government, led to mass labor mobilization among a set of autonomous unions (os autênticos) in the industrial belt of Greater São Paulo, known as the ABC (or ABCD) paulista. The São Bernardo Metalworkers’ Union, headed by Lula da Silva (union secretary since 1972), led the nascent movement (Sluyter-Beltrão 2010). Since the early 1970s, os autênticos had explicitly rejected Brazil’s longstanding corporatist system of state/labor relations. Under this system, the Brazilian political elite, since the Estado Novo period (1937-45), had prohibited cross-sectoral unionization, instead engaging unions vertically by individual sector and, according to autonomous unionists, cowing and coopting union leaders (derisively called pêlagos) at the expense of rank-and-file workers. This pattern of relations had persisted, with minor variations, across authoritarian and democratic periods.

20 In 1973, due to the global oil supply shock and resulting spike in inflation, the Médici government ‘repositioned’ worker salaries by indexing wages to inflation, across the board.

21 The ABC region comprises the outlying cities of Santo Amaro, São Bernardo do Campo, São Caetano, and (later) Diadema and housed the core and supporting industries associated with Brazil’s booming automobile sector. With the addition of Diadema (formerly part of São Bernardo do Campo, some began to call the ABC paulista the ABCD paulista.
The wage recovery campaign thrust the autonomous union movement into the national spotlight. The ‘new unionism’ (novo sindicalismo), as it came to be called, rapidly spread to urban centers and rural areas across regions and occupational sectors. By 1978, the movement counted nearly three million workers, roughly a quarter of Brazil’s formal-sector working class (Rodríguez n.d.: 145).\footnote{22} In 1978, the metalworkers of the ABC paulista spearheaded the first in a wave of general strikes, pressing for higher real wages as well as more favorable tenure policies, increased shop-floor representation, and relaxed criteria for union formation and expansion.

As the new unionism’s ‘star’ rose in the late 1970s, the Catholic left became heavily involved in the autonomous labor struggle. The progressive wing of the Catholic Church had emerged as a key opposition force during the hard-line era of military rule.\footnote{23} Beginning in the early 1960s, Brazil had witnessed a proliferation of Catholic grassroots communities (CEBs): small groups of lay Catholics, usually between ten and seventy individuals, who organized on a regular basis, in or outside of church, to analyze the Bible, examine the relationship between biblical teachings and everyday experience, and discuss political and social issues generally (Cavendish 1994). The CEBs emerged in a broader context of Church liberalization and reorientation toward issues of poverty and social justice, reflected globally in the Second Vatican Council (1962-1965) and regionally in the rise of Liberation Theology (Gutiérrez 1971) and the Catholic Conferences of Medellín (1968) and Puebla (1979).

From the early 1960s to mid-1970s, tens of thousands of CEBs sprouted up in rural areas, middle-class urban neighborhoods, and slums (e.g., the favelas encircling metropolitan São Paulo). By the end of the Anos de Chumbo, Brazil counted approximately 40,000 CEBs (Skidmore 1988). As authoritarian constraints tightened and repression increased under \footnote{22}This made the New Unionism the largest independent labor movement in Brazilian history.

\footnote{23}Levine 1986; Mainwaring 1986; Skidmore 1988; Cavendish 1994.
Costa e Silva and Médici, the Catholic Church provided an ‘umbrella of safety’ for regime opponents (Cavendish 1994: 187). CEBs became one of a few secure fora for political dissent in the country.

During the harshest years of repression, CEBs and interlinked neighborhood associations became hubs of opposition activity, giving refuge to potential targets of repression and offering resources and safe meeting places to dissident groups of various stripes (Cavendish 1994).

CEB members’ affinity with the new unionism stemmed from a range of factors, including common class backgrounds (CEB members belonged overwhelmingly to the ‘popular classes’), similar organizational cultures (e.g., grassroots participation), and a range of shared values (e.g., equality, anticentralism, bottom-up change). CEBs supported and encouraged the formation of rural and industrial new unions through the Pastorais da Terra and Pastorais Operárias. CEBs also built bridges between the new unions and other social movements, particularly poor neighborhood associations (Keck 1992: 79).

Minority sectors of Brazil’s Marxist left also became involved in the autonomous labor struggle. Despite competition and conflict between the new unionism and the communist party ‘establishment’ (i.e., PCB, PCdoB, MR-8), numerous smaller Marxist networks and organizations, drawn to the new unionism’s militant class consciousness, created new union cells to foment and participate in the autonomous mobilization of organized labor.

As the labor movement’s external ties proliferated, new unionist demands and goals broadened from labor reform to democratization and the reduction of poverty and inequality through socialist policies. ‘[T]he new unionism soon established itself at the forefront of the democratic opposition forces’ (Sluyter-Beltrão 2010: 4).

25 About which more below.
In response to the general strike of 1978, the Geisel government conceded real wage increases but did not give ground in other areas. Consequently, a view took hold within the new unions that autonomous workers needed political representation in order to secure fundamental labor reform. In July of 1978, Lula, aware that the increasingly soft-line military regime would soon open the party system to independent new entrants, wrote that a labor-based party in Brazil ‘was just a matter of time’ (paraphrased in Secco 2011: 40). At the 1978 Oil Workers’ Congress in Salvador, Bahia, new unionists officially proposed the creation of the Workers’ Party for the first time (Secco 2011: 267). In January of 1979, new unions approved the creation of the party, overriding a small minority of dissenting voices (Keck 1992: 67).

The push to create the Workers’ Party began, in earnest, in 1979. Following the new unions’ second general strike in March 1979, the newly inaugurated Figueiredo government (1979-85), instead of making policy concessions, harshly repressed participating unions across the country, from Rio Grande do Sul to São Paulo to Minas Gerais. Police arrested a large number of auténticos and imprisoned the new unionism’s three ‘principal leaders’, Lula da Silva, Olívio Dutra, and Jacó Bittar, for weeks. Anti-labor repression galvanized the PT leadership and base. The new union leadership formulated a statement of principles (Carta de Princípios) and distributed approximately 200,000 copies to attendees of the 1979 May Day rallies, held in most of the country’s major population centers (Bahia, Ceará, Minas Gerais, Rio de Janeiro, Rio Grande do Sul, São Paulo) (Keck 1992: 67).

By late 1979, a national, ‘big-tent’ opposition movement had taken shape, which spanned...
elites in the political, cultural, and economic spheres and a host of interlinked civil society actors, including student movements, neighborhood associations, the Catholic left, Marxist parties and organizations, and – at the forefront – new unions (Skidmore 1988; Moreira Alves 1988). Despite their many internal differences, these groups united around the demand for democracy in order to force concessions from an increasingly soft-line military regime.

As the opposition movement reached peak strength, Brazil’s controlled transition to democracy accelerated. In late 1979, amid social unrest and an economic slowdown, the Figueiredo government granted amnesty to all Brazilians still in exile and scheduled direct gubernatorial and mayoral elections for 1982, to be held concurrently with the congressional elections that had continued, with periodic disruptions and institutional manipulations, since the 1964 coup. In a new Organic Law of Political Parties, the government liberalized Brazil’s party system, dissolving ARENA and the MDB, and allowing the formation of new parties for the first time since 1965.

The Organic Law, which took effect several months after the May Day rallies, imposed steep electoral and organizational barriers to entry for new parties. In crafting the law, the Figueiredo government had two objectives: first, ‘to divide the opposition’ and thus ‘[stem] the rising tide’ of the MDB (Keck 1992: 87); second, to favor new parties built on the outgoing party establishment, while preventing the entry of outside political forces. The law stipulated that new parties with one-tenth of the national congress’s current members (Chamber plus Senate) could obtain registry immediately. The rest, within twelve months of the law’s passage, had to hold local party conventions (and thus to establish local offices) in twenty percent of the municipalities of at least nine states.

To establish a local office, new parties had to incorporate, as members, two percent of the electorate in the smallest municipalities (i.e., those with fewer than 1000 voters) and 1170+

members in the largest municipalities (i.e., those with more than 500,000 voters). Parties would lose their registry if, in any future congressional election, they did not receive three percent of the national vote as well as five percent of the vote in nine states. Moreover, the law prohibited parties from mounting municipal campaigns in municipalities without a party Diretório. All of these provisions favored new parties built on old and outgoing established parties, as established parties could transfer politicians and infrastructure to their successors.

The voto vinculado provision of the Organic Law stipulated that voters, on pain of ballot annulment, had to vote for the same party’s candidates in every state or national race on the ticket. Thus, parties, in order to compete in a given state election, for example, had to field a gubernatorial candidate. This would force smaller opposition parties, in 1982, to place otherwise electable elites in gubernatorial races that they stood no chance of winning.

Excluding the short-lived Partido Popular (PP), five Brazilian parties obtained registry in advance of the 1982 congressional elections. All save the PT met the electoral or organizational requirements by inheriting legislators, members, and infrastructure from currently or previously established parties (Power 2000). Two of the four, the Social Democratic Party (PSD, est. 1979) and Brazilian Democracy Movement Party (PMDB, est. 1981), succeeded the ARENA and MDB organizations, respectively. The Brazilian Labor Party (PTB), to which deposed ex-president João Goulart had belonged, also resurfaced and split in two. Former PTB leader, Leonel Brizola, and a group of PTB elite allies and associated activist/patronage networks secured registry as the Democratic Labor Party (PDT) in 1979. Under the symbolic leadership of Ivete Vargas (niece of Getúlio), separate PTB networks with strong rural clientelistic linkages retained the PTB label and became registered.

32 In addition, the law stipulated that in order to field state and local candidates, parties had to have offices in the relevant state or municipality.

33 The PP merged into the PMDB quickly after securing registry.
Unlike the above parties, the PT lacked a partisan predecessor and thus could not count on a ‘ready-made’ territorial network of local elites, activists, and branches. Most Marxist and Social Democratic leaders in Brazil – including Fernando Henrique Cardoso and other leaders of the MDB’s Tendência Popular – argued against the creation of the PT, charging the party with dividing Brazil’s progressive opposition and, in doing so, ‘making the perfect the enemy of the good’.

Building the early PT organization

From inception, the PT developed in adversity. Party founders lacked access to public and private resources and faced a closed, hostile, and highly influential mass media establishment. Paradoxically, these conditions created a powerful electoral incentive for early PT leaders to invest in mass party structures. The early PT stood as an exception in the Brazilian party system, putting a premium on grassroots organization-building and treating physical territory as the key arena of electoral politics (Meneguello 1989). Within a decade, the PT had built a powerful grassroots organization, with a dense infrastructural presence in several regions of the national territory and a large, committed base of card-carrying members.

Low access to resources

With a new and untested party label, a radical and adversarial profile, and the nationally established, center-left MDB on its right ‘flank’ (Kitschelt 1994), the PT, on creation, attracted very few established left-wing political elites. Brazil’s three largest Marxist parties, the PCB

34 Of these four, the PDS and PMDB remained serious national contenders in the long term and also produced offshoots – the PFL/DEM (est. 1985/2007) and PSDB (est. 1988), respectively – that became institutionalized as major national parties.
(est. 1922), PC do B (est. 1962), and MR-8 (est. 1964), immediately ‘jumped on the PMDB bandwagon’. In total, ten elected officeholders, all progressive MDB defectors, joined the PT in 1979-80. All ten held legislative posts at the federal or state level: one in the Senate, four in the Chamber of Deputies and six in the São Paulo state assembly (Keck 1992: 82, 95). Although the PT’s MDB defectors provided valuable office space, telecommunications equipment, and administrative staff these organizational resources constituted a tiny fraction of what PT leaders would need in order to secure registry, much less to build a national party. In a country with over twenty states and over 4000 municipalities, the PT did not hold a single executive post in 1979-80.

Strikingly, the PT continued with minimal state resources for nearly a decade. Prior to 1988, the PT elected only three mayors, two in small cities (Diadema in 1982, Santa Quitéria do Maranhão in 1982) and one in the larger Fortaleza, Ceará (1985). Only in 1988 did the PT win a major subnational executive position, the mayoralty of São Paulo. In the same year, the PT won thirty additional mayoralities – two in state capitals (Porto Alegre, RS; Vitória, ES) – and, for the first time, crossed the ten-percent threshold in Chamber seat share (10.2). In 1992, the PT won two small governorships, in the Federal District of Brasília and the state of Espírito Santo. The PT did not win the presidency or a major governorship (i.e., in São Paulo, Minas Gerais, Bahia, or Rio de Janeiro) before 2000.

37 João Batista Breda, Sérgio dos Santos, Irma Passoni, Marco Aurélio Ribeiro, Geraldo Siqueira, Eduardo Suplicy.
38 According to Keck (1992), the early PT’s MDB defectors provided ‘critical infrastructural and logistical support during the period of party legalization’ (Keck 1992: 73). The ‘benefits they brought with them were enormous’ and included ‘meeting rooms, clerical help, free telephone service to other parts of Brazil’, ‘staff aides for research, mailings, and preparing other printed material’. ‘Most of the PT deputies dedicated as much as possible of this resource to party work’ (Keck 1992: 83).
The early PT also suffered from weak financing. From inception, the party depended for official revenue on four sources: (1) membership dues, (2) mandatory salary contributions (cotizações) from PT public officeholders, elected and unelected, (3) the federal party fund, with each party’s financial allotment determined by its percentage of Chamber seats, and (4) volunteer contributions from individuals or corporations, whether outright donations or purchases of PT products such as shirts, pins, etc.

From the early 1980s to mid-1990s, the majority of party funding came from salary contributions (Ribeiro 2010: 106). In March 1982, the PT mandated that petista public officials donate an extraordinary thirty percent of their salaries to the party (Secco 2011: 75), roughly ten times the percentage contributed, on average, by members of other Brazilian parties (Keck 1992: 133). During this time, the remainder of PT financing came primarily from the federal party fund (Keck 1992: 111; Secco 2011: 105-7), despite the PT’s modest presence in the national legislature. The national Diretório formally required PT members to provide a small due (a cafezinho) to their municipal Diretório, but in practice, few ever did (Secco 2011: 105). The early PT explicitly eschewed ties to business and the economic elite, trumpeting itself as a partido sem patrões (‘party without sponsors’). Corporate contributions would remain ‘taboo’ (Ribeiro 2010: 109; Secco 2011: 107) until the mid-1990s and only become an explicit national objective in the 2000s.

Federal law prohibited formal linkages to, or donations from, unions. The ban on union donations deprived the PT of a revenue source available to many classic labor-based parties.

40 According to one party founder and campaign strategist, the timing of the increase in corporate contributions resulted from several factors. First, in the mid-1990s, a large number of PT candidates had concluded that national electoral success would require adopting modo tradicional de fazer campanha. Second, many PT candidates had toned down their socialist rhetoric and lowered their ‘negatives’ among the economic elite. Third, the PT, by the early 1990s, had won a number of important subnational positions, and in 1994, most observers believed that Lula would win the presidency. The business sector, according to the interviewee, ‘wanted in’ on the PT in order to protect its interests. Governing experience also enabled PT politicians to ‘meet businesspersons linked to the public sector’, whom party elites simply did not know during the 1980s (interview with Alli).
(e.g., Britain Labour Party, Sweden’s Social Democratic Party). Outside of formal party channels, new unions, which had ‘deeper pockets’ than any other PT feeder groups or organizations, gave money to PT Diretórios, militantes, candidates, and cash-strapped local PT politicians, especially vereadores. The new unionists directed such contributions primarily, but not exclusively, to petistas with new union origins. Informal union contributions increased significantly after the creation of the CUT in 1982 (about which more below). One early party member recalled, for example, that the PT only began to use carros de som after the formation of the CUT.

Still, the PT suffered great penury until the late 1980s and remained financially weak until the second half of the 1990s. Annual party revenue ranged from 200,000 to 450,000 inflation-adjusted Brazilian reais between 1983 and 1986. From 1986 until the mid-1990s, annual revenue never exceeded 2.6 million reais (the figure in 1992) (Ribeiro 2010: 111). Consequently, countless PT fliers from the 1980s exhort militantes and supporters to donate money (in addition to campaign labor):

‘Our party is poor, just like Brazilian workers. It lives off small donations from its members (filiados) and activists (militantes), who organize small parties and sell bônus. We don’t use paid campaigners (Cabos Eleitorais) and run a decent, honest campaign.’ – Campaign booklet for a slate of PT candidates in Rio de Janeiro state, 1982

‘We rely on the resources that we can create collectively. That’s why each person’s contribution is fundamental.’ – Bulletin for Francisco ‘Chico’ de Souza’s state deputy campaign, 1986

‘In contrast to the other parties, which have the wealth from exploiting millions of workers to invest in their candidates’ campaigns...the PT and the Frente Brasil Popular [the PT’s

In short, the formative-phase PT operated under severe resource constraints. Early party leaders could not provide financial or career inducements to activists save from officeholders’ salary contributions, jobs and resources controlled by a small number of governors, mayors, and legislators, and meager allotments from the federal party fund. In light of Brazil’s vastness and population size, the patronage and finance held by early party elites could not begin to fuel a national electoral effort. The distribution of selective incentives thus played almost no role in the PT’s development until the late 1980s, and a marginal role until the second half of the 1990s.

‘Whoever has television, radio, and newspapers will always be in power.’ – Antônio Carlos Magalhães 1975

Under military rule, television became the dominant medium in Brazil, particularly in the political news domain. Television ownership skyrocketed during the 1960s and 1970s, growing by tens of millions. During this period, Brazilians, by and large, did not use the radio to obtain news (Porto 2003: 292) and only a tiny fraction of the population used radio for musical entertainment (Porto 2003: 292). Although some radio show hosts used their radio audiences to launch political careers (Porto 2003: 292), relatively few Brazilians consumed radio in order to obtain political news. Evidence suggests that radio has become a more important campaign vehicle in recent years (Boas n.d.).

52 Broadly, Brazilians preferred television and print media as news sources, using radio for musical entertainment (Porto 2003: 292). Although some radio show hosts used their radio audiences to launch political careers (Porto 2003: 292), relatively few Brazilians consumed radio in order to obtain political news. Evidence suggests that radio has become a more important campaign vehicle in recent years (Boas n.d.).
By the late 1970s, the vast majority of Brazilians learned about politics from television, and ownership or indirect control of popular local/regional TV stations had become essential for political success. By law, television and radio networks could only own a handful of state and local stations. Vargas-era federal statutes gave the Brazilian president exclusividade not only in granting general broadcasting licenses to major networks but also in distributing the ownership rights of all state and local television and radio stations not owned by media corporations (i.e., the vast majority of the total).

Moreover, the law allowed politicians and candidates to receive broadcasting concessions. Although politicians could not legally serve as station directors, they could, in their capacity as owners, appoint all station personnel (including directors) and thus dictate station content from ‘behind the scenes’. In 1993, Milton Tavares, a Brazilian lawyer, observed that in practice, politicians who owned local stations had long appointed supporters, friends, or family members to directorships, taking effective control of station content.

As mass media expanded in Brazil, control of broadcasting concessions became a major ‘pa-

53 Brazilians might also have been more likely to view newspapers as politically biased. The director of Gallup Brazil stated in 1993 that ‘television [in Brazil] has more credibility than print media’ for the simple reason that, for most viewers, images lend trustworthiness to news stories. ‘The vast majority of the television-watching population’, he stated, ‘do not see a political position...in the different TV channels’ and, in general, ‘think that what they see on TV is true’ (Carlos Matheus, Director of Gallup Brazil, quoted in documentary, Beyond Citizen Kane). Explaining public skepticism toward newspapers, one veteran reporter and PT member emphasized in an interview that Brazilian newspapers, in contrast to television programs, have never contained separate editorial sections and thus have always incorporated political biases – quite perceptibly, in his view – into their supposedly objective presentations of ‘the news’ (interview with Kotscho). A petista functionary offered a different perspective, stating that Brazilian media, print and television alike, are more ‘camouflaged’ than in the US. Citing Folha and Veja as examples, she claimed that Brazilians, even educated ones, wrongly believe that media sources, in general, are objective (interview no. 5)

54 Newspapers and news weeklies affected politics mainly through elite channels, helping set elite agendas (Porto 2003: 291) but only contributing marginally to the mass dissemination of news. Television exerted vastly more influence on public opinion.

tronage cow’ and source of power for the president. Presidents generally awarded television and radio concessions either to established allies (often politicians) or to local politicians or media outfits in exchange for political support. Rômulo Furtado, Secretary General of the Ministry of Communications from 1974 to 1990, summarized the presidential perspective: ‘If I were president, I would never give a license or concession to an enemy’.

Porto (2003: 293-4) summarizes that, beginning in the 1970s, the ‘consolidation of urbanisation and of the cultural industry...originated a new kind of relationship between the state and local oligarchies’. In exchange for allying with the president, local and regional political bosses received broadcasting concessions and ‘began controlling the electorate...by using the local media, creating the new phenomenon of electronic coronelismo’, as opposed to traditional coronelismo.

In order to maximize ratings, local and regional station owners had to rebroadcast popular national programs. By the time of the PT’s formation, the Sistema Globo de Televisão, or TV Globo (est. 1962), held a national television monopoly. TV Globo owed its success to the military regime. Roberto Marinho, the CEO of the Globo conglomerate, had openly supported the 1964 military coup. As a reward, Brazil’s military governments had 57 Nunes Leal (1949) famously coined the term coronelismo to describe the clientelistic system that dominated rural politics in mid-twentieth century Brazil: one in which landowners secured the political allegiance of their rural workers – largely through the distribution of individualized material benefits (e.g., credit, cash) – and directed them to vote for particular politicians, who protected the landowners’ interests (e.g., by blocking land reform). A large number of scholars now use the term coronelismo eletrônico to capture powerful elites’ control of local and regional broadcast media – and hence of their own political futures, given the increasing centrality of broadcast media to contemporary electoral politics. These include Stadnik (1991); Motter (1994); Costa and Brener (1997); Bayma (2001); Capparelli and dos Santos (2002); Porto (2003); dos Santos and Capparelli (2005); dos Santos (2006); Lima and Lopes (2007); Pieranti (2008); Stevanin and dos Santos (2011); Góes (2012); Boas (n.d.).

58 In the lead-up to the April 1964 coup – often termed the revolução (‘revolution’), especially by supporters – the CEO of the Globo conglomerate, Roberto Marinho, openly sided with the military, despite having previously supported President Goulart. In an early 1990s interview, Armando Falcão, Brazilian Minister of Justice from 1974 to 1979, described Marinho as a revolucionário da primeira hora (‘revolutionary in the first instance’) (from Beyond Citizen Kane.)
nurtured TV Globo in its infancy[^59] and, throughout the 1960s and 1970s, given TV Globo preferential treatment in the allocation of broadcasting spectra, federal subsidies and the non-enforcement of regulations (Lawson 2002: 184).

The military had also made it ‘impossible’ for other networks ‘to compete commercially with Globo’ and been ‘careful to avert the formation of any [competitors]’ (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 33). As noted earlier, the Médici government canceled the broadcasting license of the Excélsior network in 1970, and months after taking office in March 1980, the Figueiredo government (1980-5) did the same to Rede Tupi (est. 1950), previously Brazil’s largest television network and a Globo competitor in the ‘make-or-break’ areas of telenovelas and news[^60].

The only television networks besides TV Globo that thrived under military rule did so by assuming niches outside the TV Globo-dominated domains of telenovelas, sitcoms, and news. The seminational Bandeirantes (est. 1967) functioned as ‘a specialized channel of sports, movies, direct sales, and packaged programming’. The younger Sistema Brasileiro de Televisão (est. 1981) ‘cautiously [avoided] any kind of competition with Globo’ and ‘consolidated as a distant second place’ during the 1980s (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 33).

By the mid-1970s, TV Globo’s flagship, prime-time news program, Jornal Nacional (est. 1969), commanded the highest nightly news ratings in Brazil by a wide margin. The network’s news monopoly increased considerably during the second half of the 1970s due to the [^59]: TV Globo arose in 1962 – two years before the military coup – from a controversial agreement between the Globo media conglomerate (est. 1925) and the US-based Time-Life. In exchange for a share of future profits, Time-Life provided TV Globo with a massive infusion of start-up capital and thus an overwhelming advantage over competitors. Globo received six-million USD in start-up capital from Time-Life, compared to 300,000 USD for the Tupi network, then Brazil’s largest television network. When the military seized power, TV Globo, trammeled by lawsuits resulting from the Time-Life deal, still did not possess legal status. In an explicit gesture of favoritism, the Castelo Branco government canceled pending legal investigations of TV Globo and awarded the network a television license in 1965.

[^60]: Rede Tupi produced Brazil’s first major telenovela, O Direito de Nascer, in the mid-1960s.
placement of popular, Globo-produced telenovelas alongside Jornal Nacional in the prime-time slot. Given the popularity of TV Globo programming, especially during prime time, most state and local stations, in order to succeed, had to obtain rebroadcasting rights from Globo.61

Not only did TV Globo enjoy hegemony in the all-important television sector, the Globo conglomerate stood alone in holding top positions across hard news, television, radio, and print media. Almost all hard news came from the Globo News Agency, Brazil’s largest, and two São-Paulo-based newspapers,63 the Estado de São Paulo and Folha de São Paulo.64 The Sistema Globo de Rádio commanded the second largest radio audience (after Bandeirantes) and O Globo the third largest newspaper readership (after Folha and Estado).65

61 By the 1970s, the path to political dominance at the state level involved two steps: first, ‘offering political support in exchange’ for TV and radio licenses from the federal government, and second, securing the legal right to rebroadcast TV Globo content, ‘since it [was] the dominant network’ (Porto 2003: 295). According to Amaral and Guimarães (1994), ‘[i]f local stations [did] not partner with Globo, they [would] command a much smaller audience and have far less influence. [Joining] the weaker second- or third-ranked national systems...[was] a cut above standing alone’, while ‘autonomy...[was] synonymous with high costs, marginalization, and exclusion from the market’ (32).

63 Unlike in the United States, news weeklies (especially Veja) have also played a significant role in news-gathering (Porto 2003: 291).

64 Interview with Kotscho.

65 By the early 1990s, Bandeirantes and Globo (Sistema Globo de Rádio) owned roughly three quarters of Brazil’s national AM/FM radio channels (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 30). Bandeirantes owned 92 channels, the Globo network fifty, the other major radio networks – Jornal do Brasil, Brazilian South, and Manchete – owned 25, 17, and five, respectively. By 2000 (NEED OLDER DATA), Folha, Estado, and Globo’s national newspaper (O Globo), boasted daily circulations of 472,000, 367,000, and 335,000, respectively. Globo did not enter the news weekly market, traditionally dominated by the conservative-leaning magazine Veja (est. 1968), until 1998. With Época, Globo quickly attained a top position. As of 2003, three news weeklies dominated the market: Veja (owned by the Grupo Abril, est. 1968), Globo’s Época, and Isto É (owned by Editora Três, est. 1976), with readerships of 1,152,000, 498,000, and 381,000, respectively (Porto 2003: 291).
quently tended to leaned conservative in their news coverage. These included SBT, Estado, Veja, and even Folha on some accounts. Ricardo Kotscho generalized, for example, generalized that a handful of ‘conservative, traditional’ families have controlled news production in Brazil since before the military era, citing the Marinho family (Globo), the Mesquita family (Estado), the Civita family (Veja), and the Frias family (Folha). The founder of SBT (est. 1981), TV host Sílvio Santos, openly espoused conservative views.

In summary, when the PT materialized on the political scene and initially developed at the end of the military era, TV Globo held a monopoly in television news, while a handful of predominantly conservative private media corporations, led by Globo, dominated the broader news market. In most Brazilian states, the leading television channel featured Globo news programming, including the prime-time Jornal Nacional and telenovelas, while the leading newspaper obtained hard news from the Globo News Agency. Very often, the same individual or group owned the leading television station, radio station, and newspaper (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 30). Under these conditions, neutral or anti-establishment independent media might flourish in select, lightly monitored locales, but never at the national or state level.

66 Media observers, including within the PT, have often noted that that the conservatism of media ‘higher-ups’ (the cúpula) generally ‘carried the day’ and often created tension with rank-and-file journalists (the base) (interview with Kotscho). ‘In São Paulo, [the media] are family dynasties, and in the rest of the states, the politics of the news business owners goes (faz-se)’. From interview entitled ‘Meios de comunicação, balanço e compromisso’ in PT newspaper (CSBH archive). A 1986 campaign newspaper for PT candidates José Dirceu and Jorge Baptista, for example, states that ‘[d]espite journalists’ resistance, the owners of the media manipulate information in accordance with their interests and only divulge the facts and version that serve the interests of the dominant classes’ (from CSBH archive). See also ‘Meios de comunicação, balanço e compromisso’, late 1980s PT newspaper (pp. 2-3), from CSBH archive.

67 One PT founder from São Paulo reserved special criticism for Globo and other broadcasters, on the ground that they, in contrast to newspapers and magazines, depend on public concessions and thus owe neutrality to the public (interview with Donato).

68 Interview with Kotscho.

69 In the late 1980s, Santos would seek the presidential nomination of Brazil’s most right-wing party, the PFL, before aborting his candidacy.
Amid the opposition ferment of the late 1970s, TV Globo functioned as the military’s unofficial mouthpiece. TV Globo systematically emphasized – and occasionally exaggerated – the military’s accomplishments, especially on the economic front. Lawson (2002) summarizes this aspect of the implicit understanding between Globo and the military: ‘...[The] Globo network played an important role in supporting the military’s ideological objectives by advancing an image of Brazil as an economic powerhouse.... In return, the network benefited from repeated allocations of broadcasting spectra and from the general growth of a heavily subsidized television market’ (Lawson 2002, p. 184)

Equally, TV Globo omitted, distorted, and manipulated developments in order to weaken and defame the political opposition. In some cases, TV Globo’s censorship extended beyond military dictates. For example, while the military forbade any airing of music by popular artist and regime opponent, Chico Buarque, TV Globo forbade mention of Chico Buarque’s name altogether. During the new unionists’ 1980 general strike, TV Globo drastically underreported the number of striking workers, misrepresented union demands, and aired statements from the industrialist, Mário Garnero, while cutting statements by Lula from the broadcast. In a late 1980s interview on media, Jorge Baptista, journalist and PT leader, remarked that ‘in a country of our dimensions, a political fact only becomes a POLITICAL FACT (emphasis in original) when it manages to pass through the meios de comunicação de massas...’

In the PT’s first high-profile attempt at municipal governance (in Diadema), the party ‘did not enjoy a sympathetic national press; there was extensive reporting of intraparty conflict and of the PT’s mistakes in Diadema, and very little coverage of successful efforts’ (199; for details, see 210). Remarkably, from early 1983 to early 1984, TV Globo did not cover the Diretas Já! movement, which the PT led at the grassroots level. Only in the final month of mobilization (April 1984) did Globo provide coverage, ‘caving in’ due to ratings competition from other media outlets and mounting pressure from the public and from sectors of influential journalist unions, including Globo’s own.

Moreover, before 1985, Brazilian parties possessed virtually no media platform of their own. Federal law prohibited parties from purchasing television time, and the Lei Falcão (1976-1985) placed major restrictions on public radio and television advertisements, only permitting parties to display static party logos and candidate pictures/blurbs. In a context of media neutrality, the Lei Falcão and prohibitions on the purchase of media time might have helped level the ‘playing field’, and thus benefited the early PT, by preventing the richest parties from pouring millions of dollars into slick, effective campaign ads. Given the conservatism of network coverage, however, these laws denied the PT the only opportunity it might have enjoyed to control a mass-consumed set of party messages and images. In this way, the law magnified the political influence of Brazil’s Globo-dominated mass media establishment.

Given the legal constraints on public political advertisements and the legal prohibition of private television and radio ads, Brazil’s dominant media networks, despite their dependence on public concessions, effectively ‘filled the void’, pushing a broadly conservative agenda and sometimes broadcasting ‘open propaganda’, both positive and negative, in order to influence electoral outcomes.

The PT and media post-transition

Relative to other media, television grew in political influence after the transition to civilian rule. By 1989-90, almost ninety percent of Brazilians obtained political information from television, either primarily or exclusively (Porto 2003: 291). Meanwhile, print media penetration remained weak. As late as 2000, only four daily newspapers were sold per one hundred citizens. In the early 2000s, only two thirds of Brazilians could read beyond a basic level, while only a third boasted more than a secondary education. Brazil continues to lag behind most of the world, including most middle-income Latin American countries (e.g., Argentina, Chile), in newspaper readership.

The critique focused on the Globo network (bulletin entitled ‘Jornalistas de oposição: Boletim de Campanha Chapa 2’ (date unknown).

Given the outgoing military’s relatively high level of support during the transition, especially from the economic elite and middle class, Brazil experienced a slow, incomplete transition to democracy, which the military largely ‘imposed’ (Karl 1990). Relative to more discredited outgoing militaries in the region (e.g., in Argentina), the Brazilian military retained considerable powers post-transition (Stepan 1988; Valenzuela 1992). Some scholars of the post-transition period have focused on the persistence of ‘traditional politics’ (Hagopian 1996) and the military’s efforts, through legal measures, to impose officialist successor parties and prevent the formation of external, anti-establishment parties like the PT (Mainwaring 1999; Power 2000). Others have focused on more specific issues such as budget allowances, weak civilian oversight of the military, and military control of the police, the intelligence services, and state enterprises (Stepan 1988). Relatively few scholars of the Brazilian transition have highlighted ‘authoritarian enclaves’ in the media domain.

Some of President Figueiredo’s final actions in office presaged what would follow under the Sarney and Collor administrations. In the ‘waning days’ of military rule, Figueiredo ‘awarded a number of licenses to political allies, even altering the planned allocation of broadcast frequencies to different cities so that space on the radio spectrum would be available where it was politically expedient’ (Boas n.d.: 2-3). According to petistas José Dirceu and Jorge Baptista, these concessions included multiple radio channels for federal deputies José and Marcinino Camargo, the latter ‘linked to Maluf and the PDS’.

Under the Sarney administration (1985-90), the distribution of local television and radio licenses on political grounds ‘reached a new level’ (Porto 2012: 63). The president and his communications minister, Antônio Carlos Magalhães, ‘extensively used broadcasting licenses as political currency’ (Porto 2012: 63; see also Motter 1994). Of the 1028 TV and radio concessões that Sarney dispensed during his term, he distributed 539 (over half of the total) in the final nine months of the 1987-88 Constituent Assembly. Of these, he awarded nearly one-hundred to assembly representatives who, in exchange, supported the continuation of Brazil’s presidential system and a one-year extension of Sarney’s term (Motter 1994; Porto 2003: 294; Boas n.d.).

Broadly, Sarney and Magalhães awarded coveted concessions to state-level allies and supporters (sometimes family members), conditional on legislative support, ground campaign help, advantageous local and regional media coverage, and/or other political favors.

Although Brazil’s 1988 constitution transferred control of concessões to the Communications Ministry and mandated congressional approval for awarding/canceling concessions, separate provisos such as the extension of licenses to fifteen years, exemptions for rebroadcasting stations, and quorum and voting rules for congressional approval allowed the media establishment and the Communications Ministry – and hence the president – to retain effective control (Amaral and Guimarães 1994; Porto 2003).\footnote{Porto (2003) writes: ‘Although the new constitution included measures that restricted the politically motivated use of TV and radio licences, electronic colonelism continues to be a key feature of the Brazilian political system.... Nevertheless, the constitution also established quorum and voting rules in order for Congress to reject licences authorised by the Executive, making it very difficult for the Parliament to reject them. The changes also left out of Congress control the repetidoras, the relay stations that retransmit the broadcasting signals of the networks. This ‘lapse’ allowed presidents to continue using licences as political currency, as did Cardoso in his successful struggle to get Congress approval of his right to run for re-election’.

80 During the first three years of the new democracy, President Jose Sarney and Communications Minister Antonio Carlos Magalhaes – both powerful political bosses with media holdings themselves – authorized broadcasting concessions for 91 representatives to Brazil’s Constituent Assembly. Evidence suggests substantial back-room dealmaking: many concessions were granted during the most intense months of deliberation on the new constitution, and legislators who received licenses went on to vote overwhelmingly in favor of several key amendments supported by Sarney’ (Boas n.d.: 3).

Amaral and Guimarães (1994) summarize that ‘[t]he Constitutional Assembly of 1988 frustrated the dreams of those who backed the democratization of the Brazilian system of radio and television broadcasting via constitutional reform... [T]he wording of the 1988 law cemented the old system... [T]he possibility of change by administrative means is clearly difficult, if not impossible’ (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 34).

Five years after the Constitution’s passage, Armando Rollemberg, president of the national Journalists’ Union, could generalize that ‘political favoritism’ remains ‘the only criterion’ for awarding concessões.\footnote{Quoted in Beyond Citizen Kane.} Analysts estimate that, as of the early 1990s, two thirds of local television licenses fell under the direct or indirect control of politicians who had received concessions from the federal government.\footnote{Beyond Citizen Kane.} Moreover, in an analysis of twenty-one Brazilian states, Amaral and Guimarães (1994) found that in nineteen, a single individual or group owned both the leading newspaper and television station.

The identities and political allegiances of Brazil’s local and regional mass media barons did not shift appreciably after the transition to civilian rule. Under the Nova República, just as the traditional coroneis of the military era retained their rural clientelistic voting blocs (Hagopian 1996), the electronic coroneis of the military era, through connections to the Sarney and Collor administrations, retained media assets and alliances and ‘moved to establish dominant positions within local and regional media markets’ (Boas n.d.: 2). In 1993, Armando Rollemberg, president of Brazil’s Journalists’ Union, summarized that ‘[t]oday, all the political groups that benefited from the dictatorship and the Sarney government are the owners of the television and radio in our country. This is bad because these groups no longer represent majority public opinion. The country changed.... [It] rejected the military dictatorship. But the military’s supporters have control of the media in our country’. Porto (2003) summarizes that ‘the New Republic was...a period in which the legacy of the authoritarian past was not only maintained in some areas, but even strengthened. One example was the expansion of electronic colonelism through Sarney’s presidency’ (293).

Equally, TV Globo’s influence did not wane under civilian rule. Both Sarney and Collor had personal ties to Globo that predated and fueled their initial political ascents. During the military period, the Sarney and Collor families controlled media empires in Maranhão and Alagoas, respectively, and both Sarney and Collor, before rising to regional political prominence, had secured the exclusive right to rebroadcast TV Globo content in their home states. Sarney and Collor thus owed their early political success, in large measure, to Globo. Moreover, upon assuming the presidency, both Sarney and Collor suffered from weaknesses – low public support in Sarney’s case, weak partisan support in Collor’s case – that increased their dependence on Globo and hence their susceptibility to Globo’s influence.

The Sarney and Collor administrations manipulated regulatory enforcement to Globo’s ad-

86 Globo’s subsidiary in Alagoas state, for example, played an important, perhaps decisive role in Collor’s 1986 gubernatorial victory in Alagoas.

87 Sarney secured the rights before the 1985 transition, Collor in 1986 (in time for his 1986 gubernatorial campaign in Alagoas).

88 Argemiro Ferreiro, editor of the Rio-based newspaper, Tribuna da Imprensa (1986-91), has observed that the Globo network amassed immense power under Sarney because of the Sarney government’s ‘weakness’ and resulting susceptibility to Globo’s influence (from Beyond Citizen Kane). Amaral and Guimarães (1994) summarize, along similar lines, that ‘[t]he Globo network...imposed its structure as a national model on the civilian regimes that followed [military rule]’ (32; emphasis added).
vantage, actively contributed to the bankruptcy of NEC do Brasil and Globo’s fire-sale purchase of the company and also gave Globo executives, particularly Marinho, direct and informal influence over relevant appointments and policy matters (Porto 2003, 2012). In the early 1990s, federal police arrested several individuals in Rio de Janeiro for watching a humorous, pirated television segment in which a narrator, dubbing over a video of Marinho speaking, showed viewers how to set up a pirated television transmitter.

In short, Roberto Marinho and Globo reached the ‘apogee’ of their ‘political power’ under Sarney and Collor (Porto 2012: 64). Between 1988 and 1993, TV Globo commanded 78 percent of Brazil’s television audience, with penetration in over 99 percent of the Brazilian territory, and with 99.9 percent of Brazilian televisions carrying the network. On the typical night, fifty-eight percent of Brazil’s television audience, on average, tuned into TV Globo for the Jornal Nacional and telenovelas (CITATION NEEDED). As of the early 2000s, television remained ‘the most important medium in Brazil’ and TV Globo ‘the dominant network’, with ‘an absolute majority of the national audience ratings’ (Porto 2003: 291). TV Globo’s ‘dominance increase[d] during prime time’, and Jornal Nacional remained ‘the main TV news bulletin in the country’ (Porto 2003: 291, 299). Consequently, politicians in the Nova República depended on access to TV Globo. Federal deputy, Paulo Ramos, observed in 1993 that for legislative candidates, appearances on Globo – which Roberto Marinho

91 By the early 1990s, Marinho had become one of three Brazilian billionaires and, according to many (including Chico Buarque), the most influential civilian in the country (Beyond Citizen Kane).

92 TV Globo’s popularity also stemmed from the beloved daytime show, Xou da Xuxa (‘Xuxa Show’), which aired from 1986 to 92). During prime-time hours, twenty-four percent of the national television audience watched SBT (Porto 2003: 291). Along with SBT and Bandeirantes, TV Globo controlled 93 percent of the television stations in Brazil and commanded 98 percent of Brazil’s television audience (Amaral and Guimarães 1994: 28). During the mid- to late 1990s, Globo received far more television advertising revenue than any other network, with approximately two-and-a-half times that of SBT, its nearest competitor (Porto 2003: 291).
occasionally vetoed – often made the difference between victory and defeat.\footnote{Beyond Citizen Kane.}

More importantly, \textit{Globo} and other networks continued to broadcast conservative news coverage and even ‘open propaganda’, despite the passage of important post-transition reforms, which gave parties legal tools to respond to such abuses. \textit{TV Globo} adopted a frequently laudatory, infrequently critical posture toward the Sarney government, despite allegations of rampant corruption and cronyism and the deteriorating macroeconomic conditions of the late 1980s. In a 1986 interview, Paulo Frateschi, joint organizer of Apeosep, the São Paulo state teachers’ union, observed that Sarney’s stabilization package in the late 1980s passed ‘with \textit{TV Globo}, \textit{Manchete}, \textit{Folha}, \textit{Estado}, everyone there, displaying the plan as if it were the great salvation’\footnote{Published interview entitled, ‘\textit{A Dívida É Fabricada}’ (1986), from CSBH archive.} Only when commercial interests dictated a critical approach (e.g., during the movement to impeach Collor) did \textit{TV Globo} provide more access to the opposition.

\textit{TV Globo}’s most flagrant and egregious breach of journalistic neutrality took place during the 1989 presidential election campaign, which pitted Collor against the PT’s Lula da Silva. In the campaign, ‘Lula [had been] vilified day and night by the press’, and not just \textit{Globo} (Secco 2011: 141). The management of \textit{Estado de São Paulo}, for example, imposed a pro-Collor line – not just a pro-Collor editorial position – on the paper’s rank-and-file journalists\footnote{Well-known reporter Augusto Nunes stated this publicly in 1988 (interview with Kotscho).} It was \textit{TV Globo}’s unbalanced coverage of the Lula/Collor debate, however, that likely tipped the polls in Collor’s favor. In its prime time recap of the debate, the Globo’s Jornal Nacional gave seventy seconds more air time to Collor and, more importantly, heavily edited debate segments so as to increase Collor’s favorables and portray Lula as radical and dangerous.

Vianey Pinheiro, producer of TV Globo São Paulo at the time, called the Globo’s prime time coverage of the debate – which he participated in editing – a ‘publicity special for Collor’. President of the national Journalists’ Union, Armando Rollemberg, called the coverage a ‘shameless manipulation’ and ‘flagrant breach of journalistic ethics’. During the 1989 campaign, the PT produced a television parody of Rede Globo called Rede Povo, ‘displaying, with great irony and creativity, facts...omitted by the mass media and alternative perspectives on the big national issues’ (de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 282).

It should also be noted that, after the 1985 revocation of the Lei Falcão, access to public television remained highly unequal, a point frequently stressed by PT candidates after the transition to civilian rule. A representative 1986 campaign flier for Clara Ant, PT candidate for state deputy in São Paulo, decried the ‘anti-democratic division of free time on TV’ as ‘one of many maneuvers against the PT’. In many cases, publicly funded television programs remained under the control of conservative individuals and groups. In a late 1980s interview, PT leader José Dirceu observed that with regard to curating personnel, public educational TV in Brazil – and São Paulo’s influential RTC (Rádio e Televisão Cultura) in particular – remained in ‘the times of the military dictatorship’.

In short, following the 1985 transition from military to civilian rule, the media environment did not improve for the PT. As late as 2002, Brazilian mass media remained ‘profoundly biased toward candidates of the [r]ight’ (Lawson 2002: 200). PT leaders during the early stages of the Nova República constantly decried the politics of Brazilian media and pressed for media reform:

- Many petistas who ran for legislative and Constituent Assembly seats in 1986-88 listed the democratization of media as a central platform point (e.g., Plínio Arruda Sampaio, Geraldo Siqueira).

- Summarizing a widespread view within the PT, Jorge Baptista, journalist and petista, commented on possible media reforms in an undated, Sarney-era PT newspaper interview: ‘One [way forward], mainly in relation to broadcast media, which are the most powerful, is through the control of concessions – today a privilege of the president...used to benefit the most well-connected (chegados), the closest to home (os mais intimos da casa).’

- A 1992 PT election campaign manual stated: ‘In Brazil, elections have long been characterized by radio and television abuses. In numerous elections, we have witnessed numerous instances of electoral propaganda in radio and television programs, which end up directly interfering in the electoral process... We know that...the stations (emissoras) will highlight some candidates. What we cannot allow is for the stations, on the pretext of providing news, to do open propaganda for their favored candidates and against their opponents.’

- In a 1993 interview, Lula identified the hegemony of Globo as a central impediment to full democratization in Brazil: ‘Democracy presupposes freedom of communication, speech... There won’t be democracy without the democratization of mass media... If you have one outlet that every day talks to sixty-, seventy-million people, and the control of the messages falls to a team taking ideological orders from one man [Roberto Marinho]... one is deprived of any possibility of democracy.’

In summary, under military rule and the early Nova República, the PT confronted an influential, reactionary, Globo-dominated mass media establishment, at turns closed and hostile to the left opposition. Media hostility impeded the PT’s electoral progress, and low media access constrained party elites.

Some analysts of Brazilian media have stressed the personal convictions of individual media owners, particularly Roberto Marinho, in explaining the conservatism of mass media

This argument smacks of excessive voluntarism. The longstanding structure of state/media relations in twentieth-century Brazil – not the chance preferences of media moguls – virtually ensured conservative dominance of Brazil’s airwaves and newspapers during the PT’s formation. Media corporations primarily sought profit, and in order to run profitable media enterprises, they depended on, or at least benefited greatly from, the good favor of the political establishment.

The Globo conglomerate, for example, has long prioritized commercial interests over any particular ideological agenda. Throughout its history, Globo has cultivated relationships with the governing elite, whatever the corresponding ideology. Rádio Globo received its initial concessions from Presidents Kubitschek and Goulart, to whom Roberto Marinho enjoyed regular personal access. The military regime nurtured and favored TV Globo. After military rule, Globo enjoyed a cozy, mutually advantageous relationship with Sarney and Collor (1990-2). When public opposition to Collor became overwhelming, the Globo network ‘piled on’ for commercial reasons. Argemiro Ferreiro, editor of the Rio-based newspaper, Tribuna da Imprensa, summarized in the early 1990s that the hegemonic Globo ‘[was] above all a commercial enterprise’. Globo, he summarized, ‘aligns itself with whomever is in power’, possesses a ‘governista vocation’, and functions as ‘a kind of official, or quasi-official, spokesperson for the powerful (os donos do poder).’

In closing, it should be added that for the first decade and a half, the PT, by and large, did not pursue or make effective use of the scarce media opportunities that it did have. In the 1982 subnational elections, the PT’s first major electoral test, ‘[p]robably the least effective element in the PT’s [São Paulo] campaign...was the use of the mass media.... The party was not particularly successful in linking electoral positions with topical issues of the kind likely to arouse journalistic interest. Few candidates succeeded in making use of those spaces that might have been available – TV talk shows, for example’ (Keck 1992: 143). Although the PT did become more media-friendly and -savvy over the course of the 1980s the party’s relationship with media remained fraught. In 1988-9, the PT boycotted the grande mídia. Only in the mid-1990s did the PT end its ‘war’ with mass media and begin to court all major networks actively, recognizing the importance of media not only for campaigns but also for governance.

The incentive for organization

During the PT’s formative years, the Brazilian political context dictated that any externally created party of the left must invest in organization in order to have a chance at success.
Given the influential and reactionary mass media establishment, no party conceived outside state structures, media-savvy or not, could have acquired a national following through media appeals. Only a grassroots party like the PT could have succeeded. Selection effects thus help explain the PT’s organizational strength.

Yet the PT’s investment in grassroots organization also stemmed from the explicit recognition among party founders – a recognition powerfully evidenced in campaign materials, 105 The party had a great deal of trouble getting its message across in newspaper coverage of the campaign;

news coverage tended to either report party statements flatly or to concentrate on the conflict between the PT and the PMDB’ (Keck 1992: 143).

106 Some petistas cite Eduardo Suplicy’s 1985 campaign for the São Paulo prefeitura to illustrate the party’s media learning. According to one party founder, Suplicy’s segment during the horário eleitoral gratuito remains a PT model to this day (interview with Azevedo).

internal party communications, and member interviews – that low access to resources and a hostile, closed media environment made organization fundamental. The previous sections have attempted to show that the early PT lacked access to state and private resources; that Brazil’s top media networks ignored and defamed the PT; that the PT, like all Brazilian parties, could not purchase television or radio time; and that for free public advertisements, the PT, initially, had to use a limited, ineffective platform and, after the revocation of the Lei Falcão, still had to cram party and candidate advertisements into very short time slots. The current section demonstrates that these conditions affected PT founders’ organizational calculus. Materially strapped, off the airwaves, and in competition with politicians and parties that enjoyed considerable resources and media access, early PT leaders understood that the party’s rise or fall would depend on the size, efficacy, and durability of its grassroots structures.

Archival research revealed thousands – and suggested the existence of hundreds of thousands – of campaign materials and internal communications stressing (1) the PT’s penury, (2) the mass media’s manipulation of political news, boycott of the PT, and hostility to the PT, and (3) the opposition’s great wealth and extreme media favoritism. Crucially, PT elites and activists also explicitly stressed that these difficulties rendered organization vital. Copious campaign pamphlets, activist manuals, internal analyses – as well as interview excerpts and external analyses – draw the connection between the PT’s low access to media and resources and its reliance on volunteer activism and contributions:

“My mandate was always very characterized by the grassroots (organicidade), exactly what I had built for ten years.... I was always a public figure, but not very much of the mass media. My process for building a mandate was always very linked to the grassroots party and the grassroots union movement.” – Paulo Rocha, new unionist and five-time PT legislator from Pará, describing early campaigning experiences

1989 presidential election (Lula v. Collor)

“This is a campaign with scarce economic resources because the PT is a poor party that depends on the contributions of its members, us, the workers. That’s why your support is fundamental – your desire to work and publicize the PT and Lula.” – From PT newspaper for Lula’s presidential bid

The PT’s official campaign manual for the 1989 presidential election states that, in the first phase of the campaign, ‘the entire party, each diretório municipal, núcleo, militante or filiado of the PT...has the responsibility to carry to the streets the true and only hope of change, which is Lula’s candidacy (1). The manual instructs militantes to contact ‘local radios and newspapers’ and ‘feed them campaign information on a daily basis, if possible. This scheme is fundamental for the PT and for the Frente, given that the mass media’s boycott of [our] campaign is big’ (4). Apart from the local media strategy, the manual focuses entirely on mobilization, describing the third and final phase of the campaign as ‘the moment of mass acts, rallies, agitações, and marches’

In a manual for PT activist leaders, the Comitê Popular Pró-Lula treats volunteer activism and mobilization as the core of the PT’s 1989 campaign strategy. The manual emphasizes that the party’s financial constraints – ‘for popular parties and campaigns...always the biggest problem’ – necessitate the following measures: creative money-saving (e.g., using one’s own typewriter to produce party leaflets); finding free or reduced-rate meeting places belonging to a companheiro; soliciting contributions from other militantes and supporters; hosting fundraising barbecues and parties; selling

- Mário Milani of Paraná’s Coordenação de Propaganda distributed a manual to the state’s municipal campaign committees. The manual stated: ‘It is known that the printed media (newspaper, magazine, and outdoor) and electronic media (radio, television, and cinema) are in the hands of the bourgeois parties... The big propaganda agencies, the bankers, the multinationals, the agriculturalists, and big business are armed with dollars to make their ideas count... If we use creativity, we will be able to spread our proposals more efficiently than they, who command the mass media.’ The manual proposes specific strategies, encouraging militantes, for example, to put up pictures of fists with a large ‘L’ (for Lula) and filling in the ‘ula’ later.\textsuperscript{120}

- ‘The issue of campaign financing, in a party like ours, places on us the responsibility of linking the issue tightly to the party organization and the organization of popular support committees for Lula. We have to turn the financial question into an instrument of organization for our support base. This base cannot be composed solely of militantes for the parties in the Frente Brasil Popular, but must expand to the point of organizing a network of contributors, willing to build a left alternative in the country... It falls to the PT to motivate the Frente and all the parties that compose it to embark, with boldness (ousadia), on a fund-raising drive in order to avoid being suffocated by the economic power of our adversaries. Collor, Brizola (PDT), Ulysses [Guimarães, PDT] and others have the machines of the bourgeoisie to sustain them: planes, million-dollar fundraisers, free time on TV, press coverage happen one after the other under our eyes. To contain this situation an unprecedented activist effort is necessary [emphasis not in the original]. Every Lula supporter must be a fund-raising post. Imagination must be placed in the service of seeking power. Dinners, parties, individual fund-raising, lists, bazaars, barbecues, feijoadas must multiply across the country, in order to create a true pro-Lula current.’ – PT presidential campaign bulletin, no. 9 of 14\textsuperscript{121}

  – ‘FHC is the candidate of Itamar, of the sharks in power under Collor who tried to stop his impeachment. For these candidates of the rich, money and colorful propaganda and the support of the TVs, radios, and newspapers won’t be lacking. Against them, we will put on the field the enthusiasm (garra) of the working class, the strength of the union movement, the energy of popular organizations, the thirst for change from a nation that can no longer stand so much injustice and corruption...’

The election brought back rallies, marches, the PT star and flags, from Porto Alegre to Belém, from Campo Grande to Natal’. – ‘Um Balanço Petista’ by José Dirceu (reflections on the 1996 elections)

Access to civil society and the capacity for organization

Low access to resources and media gave the PT an incentive to build a strong party organization. Access to civil society – in particular, to the new union movement, the grassroots Catholic left, and elements of the Marxist left – gave party founders the capacity to succeed. With rare exceptions and slight variations, PT members and scholars of the PT’s formation converge in identifying the new unionism, the Catholic Church, and Marxist left (often called the ‘traditional’ left or ‘organized’ left) as the three core feeder groups, or vertentes, of the PT.

Due to time and resource constraints, the early PT leadership could not make a significant material or logistical contribution to the formation of local organs and nuclei. Major national leaders visited local organs and civil society organizations to give speeches and provide encouragement and advice, while the major Diretórios disseminated manuals for setting up and sustaining nuclei, Diretórios, and electoral committees. But this was all. The party cúpula did little more than encourage local civil society leaders to build local nuclei and Diretórios from the ‘ground up’ – to assume party leadership roles, to draw volunteers and administrative resources from their own organizations and movements, and to pool participating individuals’ resources, labor, and creative energies.

Keck (1992: 94) thus summarizes that, in order to maximize territorial expansion, early PT leaders ‘[appealed] to leaders of already organized constituencies’, mainly ‘leaders of unions and grassroots movements, members of the CEBs, and members of the organized left’. A

125 Although the national leadership faced time and resource constraints, major PT leaders (including Lula) did play an important ‘ground-level’ role by visiting established local party organs or local civil society organizations to encourage leaders to create organs. In Paraná in 1982, for example, Lula once visited twelve municipal Diretórios in a single week (Secco 2011: 59). Rural union leader Manoel de Conceição played a critical, ground-level role in the formation of the PT in Maranhão and Rio Grande do Norte (Secco 2011: 59).

126 A PT text from Belo Horizonte on electoral tactics, dated Christmas 1980, stresses ‘the urgent need for the party to adopt a policy of quadro formation, of political consciousness-raising, so that in each municipality our companheiros can walk on their own two feet without feeling disoriented’ (from the CSBH archive).
PT founder and unsuccessful candidate for governor of Pernambuco in 1982 captured the early PT’s reliance, for organization-building, on local civil society leaders:

‘[The party] grew little by little.... [W]e built those PT nuclei, beginning from our relationship with leaders in each place... The shift from boss (cacique) to collective must be a long, organic trek, in the union, in the cooperative, in the association, in the neighborhood, in the community, in the settlement, in the school, wherever there are people to organize’ (emphasis not in the original).\(^{127}\)

In short, the PT’s first decade of organizational expansion occurred via ‘diffusion’ (Panebianco 1988: 5\(^{128}\)): in a decentralized and spontaneous manner, led by ‘distinct party elites in different regions, without the presence of a strong center in charge of expansion’ (Ribeiro 2010: 251-2).

In building its organization, the PT, in effect, created a new class of political elites. The PT cúpula called local civil society leaders and activists into the institutional sphere, and through internal promotion within the party organization, these leaders and activists ascended to major leadership positions and became party candidates.\(^{129}\) A flier for petista Luiz Gushiken’s 1986 federal deputy campaign stressed that ‘[i]t’s not enough just to elect our candidate. We seek to strengthen the PT, with the training of hundreds of petista leaders’ (Edgar Leuenroth archive). Keck (1992) observes that as of the early 1990s, a growing number of petistas were rising to leadership positions from within the party organization.

The PT and unions

The new union movement acted as the fulcrum of the PT’s decentralized, grassroots, party-building endeavor. Throughout the PT’s formative phase, but especially in the early 1980s, \(^{128}\)According to Panebianco’s original definition, territorial penetration, as distinct from territorial diffusion, ‘occurs when the center...leads...the formation of local...party associations. Territorial diffusion occurs when...local elites construct party associations which are only later integrated into a national organization’ (Panebianco 1988, p. 50).

new union leaders became PT leaders, new union rank-and-file became PT rank-and-file, and new union offices and members’ homes became PT offices and meeting places. New unions provided the PT with more leaders, quadros, activists, and rank-and-file members than any other civil society movement or organization. In addition, new union subculture and institutions, including the base-level internal democracy that had distinguished new unions for years, carried over into the PT (Ribeiro 2010; Secco 2011).

The PT’s new union base expanded and evolved considerably during the PT’s early development. In 1983, new unionists founded the Central Única dos Trabalhadores (CUT) in order to strengthen the new unionism. The autonomous labor movement had already begun to extend beyond its original bases (e.g., ABC paulista, Porto Alegre) to new regions and economic sectors. New unionists intended the CUT to accelerate this process. The CUT founding thus provoked the military’s last ‘gasp’ of hard-line retrenchment. The Figueiredo government struck at the heart of the just-formed confederation in 1983, intervening in an ABC metalworkers’ strike and arresting the top leadership, including Lula. Later in the same year, the CUT carried out its first general strike. Approximately two-million workers participated, suggesting that the social force of the new unionism had already increased (Secco 2011: 268). Over the next several years, the CUT expanded, and autonomous labor grew in stature. The CUT surpassed CONCLAT to become Brazil’s largest union confederation. The growth of the new unionism largely accounted for the expansion of the PT base and infrastructure, and for the PT’s increasingly national character, over the course of the 1980s.

In part, autonomous labor grew through the incorporation of rural unions, thanks to the organizing efforts of the Catholic left’s Pastorais da Terra.\textsuperscript{130} Prior to the 1983 founding of the CUT, urban new union leaders decided, somewhat contentiously, to include rural unions in the confederation. Strikingly, more than a quarter (27.3 percent) of the founding CUT signatories were rural unions (Secco 2011).

\textsuperscript{130}A PT founder from Pará, for example, recalled the integral role that CEBs played in bringing rural unions into the CUT: ‘...[W]ith the founding of the CUT-Pará, I came to lead its process of construction. In 1986, we won twenty-four rural unions, naturally, with much help from the CEBs, which were strong in Pará’ (Interview with Paulo Rocha in de Moraes and Fortes (eds., 2008): 149).

More centrally, the new unionism grew through the incorporation of public- and middle-sector unions. During the late 1970s, private-sector industrial unions, typified by Lula and the metalworkers, dominated the new unionism both numerically and in the popular imagination. For most of the 1980s, however, the ‘paradigmatic labor struggles’ involved bank workers and teachers (Keck 1992: 193). Correspondingly, after Lula’s long stint as the PT’s first president (1980-7), two bank workers – Olívio Dutra (1987-8) and Luiz Gushiken (1988-90) – occupied the party’s top internal position. As the autonomous labor movement became more middle-class, it became less confrontational, which spawned the creation, in 1986, of a leftist CUT faction, the CUT pela Base, in São Paulo (Secco 2011: 268).

Although the moderation of autonomous labor led to similar changes in the PT’s base, program, and rhetoric and the development of a softer, more inclusive external image (Keck 1992: 193), it also periodically created tension with the PT. Despite considerable overlap between the PT leadership and new unionist/CUT leadership, on occasion the PT criticized the CUT for not taking more radical positions in favor of workers’ interests (Keck 1992: 193). During the general strike of 1987, for example, a number of top PT leaders publicly rebuked the CUT leadership for not exhorting rank-and-file unionists to participate.

The above notwithstanding, the labor movement remained the PT’s backbone. In contrast to CONCLAT, whose leaders’ political allegiances varied, the CUT remained ‘basicamente petista (with minority participation from other groups)’ through the 1980s (Secco 2011: 68).

131 New unionism’s umbrella confederation (about which more later).
132 Interview with Hamilton Pereira in de Moraes and Fortes (eds., 2008: 266).
Given the internal diversity of the new unionism, the profile of the PT’s main feeder unions varied considerably across regions, within regions, and even within states. In the ABC paulista and other urban areas (e.g., Betim, MG), industrial new unions played the dominant role in building the early PT. In other, less industrial urban centers, middle-sector new unions often played the dominant role (e.g., bank workers in Porto Alegre, teachers in Rio de Janeiro and Belo Horizonte). In the Northern region, rural unions, in conjunction with the Catholic Church, tended to lead the process. In a few places, the PT created new unions, not the other way around – for example, in Maranhão, where the state’s dominant PT tendência, the PT de Aço, under the leadership of Manoel de Conceição, recruited rural workers into the new union movement.

It should be emphasized that most Brazilian unions did not join the PT or the new union movement. Many Brazilian unions had conservative leaders who rejected new unionism in order to protect their own privileged relationships with the political establishment. A significant minority had left-wing leaders who, instead of supporting the new union movement and PT, supported or belonged to Marxist parties, above all the PCB.

The PT and the Catholic left

The Catholic left played a vital role in the organizational development of the PT – especially in urban peripheries and rural areas. In the formulation of Frei Betto, CEBs possessed ‘autonomy and complementarity’ in relation to the PT (as to the new unionism previously). CEB members’ affinity with the PT largely stemmed from the characteristics and experiences that they had shared with the new unions (e.g., class backgrounds, organizational cultures, commitments to equality, bottom-up change). Yet the PT’s socialism added appeal for many on the Catholic left, who, influenced by Liberation Theology, believed that Marxism and Christianity complemented one another. Betto famously claimed in 1986 that a ‘real Christian’ is a communist, and a ‘real communist’ a Christian (Secco 2011: 45).

Members of CEBs and the Catholic left who participated in transition-era politics overwhelmingly joined or at least supported the PT. Frei Betto described the early PT as a ‘vehicle’ for social and political transformation and the CEBs as the ‘gasoline station’. CEB members drew political inspiration from their CEB experiences and set out to find appropriate vehicles, from the PT and new unions to the MST and many other civil society actors.

From the beginning, most CEBs operated in Brazil’s urban periphery and countryside. At the time of the PT’s formation, for example, thousands of CEBs operated in peripheral São Paulo alone. Because the Catholic left possessed a large grassroots base, CEBs, like the new unions, fed into the PT en masse. Many CEB members created PT núcleos de base. Some CEBs simply became PT núcleos. Tens, perhaps hundreds, of thousands of CEB members became PT members, activists, and leaders. Lincoln Secco recalled that most PT militantes in Greater São Paulo belonged to CEBs. Notable early leaders with CEB backgrounds included Olívio Dutra, Luiza Erundina, Marina Silva, and ‘many other less well-known or unknown’ petistas.

Like the new unions, the Catholic Church provided important organizational resources, especially meeting places for PT nuclei and local committees. Both Lincoln Secco and a Catholic Church scholar, in interviews, stressed that, given the resource constraints of the PT and its base, local Catholic Church organs – though they did not contribute financially to the PT, even informally – provided meeting places for PT nuclei and even offered courses in political consciousness-raising (conscientização política).

Because the Catholic Church, unlike the new unions, boasted a local infrastructure extending to the far reaches and forgotten corners of the national territory, CEBs significantly broadened the PT’s early territorial reach, especially in rural regions. The Catholic Church’s pastoral work in the Brazilian countryside ‘was fundamental for the PT’s achieving a truly national character’ (de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 262). According to Marxist PT founder Hamilton Pereira, the PT, through its linkages to the Catholic Church, ‘[became] a party that [brought] along the various expressions of Brazil. Because the Church was] a national institution’ Lula himself has observed on multiple occasions that the Catholic Church played a more important role than unions in the PT’s national implantation

Brazil’s Marxist left, from the beginning, had a complicated relationship with the PT. On the PT’s formation, the Marxist left included a pragmatic, gradualist, and institutionalist Marxist ‘establishment’, comprising the country’s two oldest and largest communist parties, the pro-Soviet Brazilian Communist Party (PCB; est. 1922) and Maoist Communist Party of Brazil (PCdoB, est. 1962), as well as the MR-8, a PCB splinter and Brazil’s third largest Marxist organization (Keck 1992: 96) With the initiation of the abertura and distensão in 143 The MR-8, a PCB splinter party, originated in 1964 under the name, the Dissidência Comunista de Guanabara, before taking the name, MR-8, in 1967 to commemorate Che Guevara’s death. The ‘MR’ stands for Movimento Revolucionário, the ‘8’ for the day Guevara died (October 8, 1967). The MR-8 gained worldwide visibility after kidnapping the United States’ ambassador to Brazil, Charles Burke Elbrick.

the mid-1970s, the PCB had moderated, choosing to support the MDB, advocate a peaceful democratic transition, and seek positions of power within Brazil’s slowly changing political regime (Secco 2011: 71). The PCdoB and MR-8 had adopted similar tactical positions as the military regime became more soft-line from the mid- to late 1970s.

Given that the PMDB belonged to the center-left and, on creation, possessed national clout, all Marxist parties that chose to participate in institutional politics had an electoral incentive to join/support the PMDB rather than the PT. Following on their previous support for the MDB, the PCB, PCdoB, and MR-8 joined the PMDB.

Not only did the Marxist establishment resist the PT, throughout the 1980s this establishment – and above all the PCB – vied with the new union movement and the PT for union loyalties. During the initial autonomous labor ferment of the late 1970s and early 1980s, new unionists had come to view the established Marxist labor leadership as insufficiently radical, will ing to denounce peleguismo but not to ‘frontally attack’ it (Secco 2011: 69). Secco (2011) summarizes that while in 1978, ‘it was difficult to radically separate PCB unionists and future PT unionists’, by 1980, differences between the new unions and the formal, Marxist union establishment had sharpened (Secco 2011: 67).

The division between Marxists and the PT/new unionism culminated in 1983, when PT and new unionist leaders, in an effort to consolidate and strengthen autonomous labor after the PT’s electoral setback of 1982, formally separated from the Unidade Sindical faction of Brazil’s umbrella labor confederation CONCLAT – considered peleguista by the auténticos – and founded the CUT. Unidade Sindical had included new unionists and most Marxist labor leaders. The Marxists did not follow the new unions into CUT, opting to remain in

144 This fact distinguishes the PT from Mexico’s PRD. In Mexico, the PMS had a strong electoral incentive to merge – and did merge – into the PRD because of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas’s national electoral clout.

145 The PCB’s decision to ally with the PMDB has led some commentators to charge the PCB with failing to ‘connect with the new spirit of the epoch’ (Rodríguez 2010: 146; see also Vianna 2001).
Lincoln Secco summarizes that the PCB, ‘until the mid-1980s’, boasted a ‘significant presence’ (capilaridade importante) in unions and ‘remained a strong opponent of the PT within the union movement’. As a consequence of this competition, animosity and distrust between the PT and the non-petista Marxist left often ran high during the PT’s early development. Among Marxists, for example, a rumor circulated ‘widely’ that General Golbery do Couto e Silva, author of Brazil’s National Security Doctrine, had supported the PT’s development in order to divide the left and weaken the PCB within the labor movement (Secco 2011: 72).

In a 1987 debate, Lula attested to the strength of Marxist parties’ union presence during the 1980s, asserting that ‘the big delay in forming the PT were the Marxists precisely’. An internal PT booklet from 1987-8 entitled ‘Os direitos dos trabalhadores e a Constituinte’ reflects ongoing tension between the PT and Marxist establishment, criticizing ‘the communists’ for letting the PMDB co-opt them, and growing ‘comfortable’ (acomodados) with ‘third-rate government positions’.

The above notwithstanding, elements of the Marxist left played a critical role in the PT’s organizational development. Taken as a whole, the Marxist left varied considerably on whether to participate in institutional politics and, more centrally, on which party, if any, to support. Although the Marxist establishment, as noted above, ‘jumped on the PMDB bandwagon’, many PCB, PCdoB, and MR-8 leaders and quadros defected and joined the PT during the late 1970s and early 1980s (e.g., José Genoino, Paulo Fonteles, Manoel de Conceição, Jamie Santos). The PT also attracted numerous, more radical Marxist organizations and networks. The Trotskyist Fração Operária (Workers’ Faction), for example, dissolved into the PT wholesale.

The PT, in order to maximize its appeal to ‘on-the-fence’ radical Marxists, tacitly permitted dupla militância, whereby petistas would enjoy license to remain active in – and primarily committed to – other parties (about which more later). Consequently, a group of small, radical Marxist parties (e.g., Democracia Socialista, PCBR, APML, and the MEP) joined the PT while remaining independent and explicitly treating the PT as a front for their revolutionary long-term goals (Keck 1992: 96). Other Marxist groups did not join the PT but actively supported it, given the PT’s external origins and ties to autonomous labor.

Unlike the new unionists and Catholic progressives, the Marxist founders of the PT did not provide a large social base. In 1991, only ten percent of petistas belonged, or had belonged, to Marxist organizations of the ‘extreme left’ (Secco 2011: 48). These organizations were small, vanguardist networks, many having engaged in ‘clandestine activity since the 1960s’ (Ribeiro 2010: 186).

Yet they ‘punched above their weight’ by contributing abilities and characteristics otherwise in short supply. Due to Marxists’ internal discipline, education and debating skills, mobilizing experience, and capacity for activist training, PT ‘radicals’ (relative to ‘moderates’) exercised disproportionate influence within the early PT organization, whether in shaping the PT’s early ideology and program organizing and leading the first base-level

150 The PT’s Marxist elements ‘considered the PT little more than an electoral front, or a space to be occupied tactically, with a long-term view toward building a revolutionary party’ (de Moraes and Fortes (eds., 2008): 32).

151 Many petistas focus on the education and rhetorical skill of the early PT’s Marxist leaders and quadros. These characteristics enabled the Marxist left to influence the PT’s ideological development, and also en-
PT núcleos and offices, training PT activists, advising PT elites, or assuming major national leadership positions.

Still, ‘[t]he importance of Marxists in the PT was always greater internally (na disputa interna) than externally’ (Secco 2010: 49). Although Marxists played a critical role in early organization-building, they possessed a limited ability to sway individuals outside the party

152 Several members and analysts have emphasized the Marxists’ role in mobilizing local PT networks and creating local and state party organs. Ribeiro (2010) stresses the Marxist left’s ‘high capacity for mobilization and activist regimentation’ (251). Two individuals, one a PT founder and leader, the other a younger Marxist ex-petista, summarized that Marxists at the time of the PT’s formation possessed invaluable experience in political mobilization, which enabled them to play a disproportionate role in member recruitment and training at the local level and in the creation of local and state Diretórios (interview with Azevedo and interview no. 3). Given the general weakness, ‘chaos’, and ‘deficiency’ of the PT’s internal press (Secco 2011: 108), the party’s Marxist networks, with newspapers like Em Tempo and O Trabalho, dominated internal public communications (Secco 2011: 110).

153 Marxists brought with them an emphasis on activist and leader conscientização (consciousness-raising) and training. Djalma Bom recalled that the Marxist tendências conscientizou many petistas, including himself (interview with Bom). One Marxist ex-petista observed that the Marxists influenced the popular leaders (e.g., new unionists) as much as the popular leaders influenced the Marxists: ‘O marxismo se concretizou e o concreto se marxizou’ (interview no. 3). In 1986, the PT, at the insistence of Marxist petistas, created a centro de formação política, the Instituto Cajamar (de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 282), and mandated, with limited success, that ten percent of party funds go to political training. Secco (2011) writes that in practice, the PT never fully adhered to this internal statute.

154 Secco (2011) observes that many Marxists became formuladores for new unionist PT elites, although they often had to tone down their ideological views in order to hold these positions (48).

155 Due to their political experience and high education levels, Marxists also assumed a disproportionate number of major national leadership positions. Half of the PT’s first National Executive Committee (ten of twenty) were new unionists (Secco 2011: 64), and most of the remainder were Marxists. (Most of the new unionists in the CEN belonged to middle-sector unions, not industrial unions, further evidencing the importance of education for attaining the highest positions within the PT (Secco 2011: 64).) While a new unionist, Jacó Bittar, served as the PT’s first national secretary of organization, most members of Bittar’s office belonged to the Marxist left (e.g., José Dirceu, José Ibrahim, Jorge Baptista) (interview with Azevedo).
fold. For this reason, Secco (2011) writes that ‘the CEBs and new unionism were the two most important social vectors of the PT’s formation’ (49; emphasis not in the original).

In places where new unions played the dominant role in early PT organization-building, both the Marxist and Catholic left typically played important secondary roles (e.g., the Pastorais Operárias in the ABC paulista; the Trotskyist Democracia Socialista (DS) in Porto Alegre). Moreover, and crucially, where new unions did not have a strong presence, the Catholic left and Marxist left played the leading roles, in some cases sharing the responsibilities of organization-building. Melo (1994) observes that in developed urban localities dominated by traditional unions (as distinct from new unions), the Marxist left and affiliated movements/organizations typically spearheaded the party-building process, while in rural localities, the Catholic grassroots left often ‘led the way’. In Rio de Janeiro, Belo Horizonte, Fortaleza, and Londrina, where most unions did not affiliate with the new unionism, Marxist intellectuals and activists, in conjunction with other groups, took responsibility for recruiting members and setting up local offices (Keck 1992; Melo 1994). In more rural states such as Acre (Keck 1992),156 Pará,157 Paraíba,158 Piauí159 and Goiás (Ribeiro 2010: 251), CEBs associated with the Pastorais da Terra played the leading role. In Vitória, the capital of Espírito Santo, CEBs played the leading role. In Pará, Goiás, Paraíba, and Rio Grande do Norte, the Marxist left made important contributions, especially in supplying top PT officials (e.g., the PCdoB and MR-8 in Pará).160

160‘You know that the PCdoB tried to build the PT in some states. That’s what happened here [in Pará]. So much that the president of the provisional committee was Paulo Fonteles of the PCdoB, the secretary general was a guy from MR-8, Jamie Santos’ (interview with Paulo Rocha in de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 148). On Marxists in Rio Grande do Norte, see Secco (2011: 43-61).
The PT benefited from ties to other civil society organizations and movements as well. From the mid- to late 1980s in particular, the PT’s societal linkages broadened from its original bases, as the party ‘managed to absorb a large part of [the] energy\textsuperscript{161} associated with the Diretas Já! movement (1983-4)\textsuperscript{162} and the MST (est. 1984) (about which more later)\textsuperscript{163} Landless workers, for example, played a key role in building the PT in Mato Grosso and Mato Grosso do Sul. In addition, the PT drew from neighborhood associations in Rio de Janeiro\textsuperscript{164} the health movement in Sorocaba, São Paulo, public transportation and environmental activists in Cubatão, São Paulo, textile workers in Paraíba, favela associations and public transportation users in Santo André, São Paulo, and neighborhood associations and post-materialist movements in several cities (Secco 2011: 43-61).

These additional civil society ties notwithstanding, the PT, for early organization-building, primarily depended on the new unions, the progressive Catholic Church, and the Marxist left. Individuals and networks from these three groups performed the large bulk of early organizational work. Early territorial expansion tended to occur in the areas, predominantly but not exclusively urban, where the new unions, Catholics, and/or Marxists had a strong presence. Elsewhere, the early PT, in the typical case, did not become heavily implanted.

A large membership and infrastructure do not, in themselves, make party organizations strong. What made the PT strong was the size but also, crucially, the commitment of its base. The PT’s adverse context of formation not only created an incentive for party leaders to invest in territorial organization, it also selected for early party-builders, or ‘early joiners’ (Greene 2007), with high levels of commitment. Consequently, the early PT built an organization with impressive territorial reach, composed of ‘believers’ (Panebianco 1988: 26-30).

The size of the early PT’s infrastructure and base

The early PT established a mass activist base and extensive local infrastructure in multiple regions of the country. Nuclei, Diretórios, and dense activist networks sprouted up in the industrial and urban municipalities of the Southeast (e.g., São Paulo, Minas Gerais) and South (e.g., Rio Grande do Sul, Espírito Santo) and in select rural states (e.g., Acre, Pará) due to the concentrated presence of civil society feeder organizations.

PT membership ‘shot up’ during the 1979-81 period. In May 1980, the PT counted roughly 30,000 members (Rodríguez n.d.: 231). By June of the following year, the number had multiplied seven fold, to approximately 200,000, or 0.36 percent of the national voting-age population. By July, the PT had organized state Diretórios in twenty-one states and claimed more than 20,000 members in four states: São Paulo, Minas Gerais, Rio de Janeiro, and Rio Grande do Sul (Secco 2011: 50). On Secco’s (2011) summary, at the time of the 1982 elections, ‘the PT was in the main states and already boasted a militância even in the Northern region, more distant from Brazil’s major political and economic centers’ (50).

As the PT set out to fulfill the legal requirements in 1979-80, the national leadership, alongside the formal party organization, actively encouraged the development of informal participatory nuclei – something not mandated by law. From 1980 to 1982, the period of greatest base-level PT ferment, thousands of petista activists created núcleos de base: informal base-level networks, composed of at least 21 petistas, which met in houses, garages, churches, etc.
to discuss, debate, and plan party-related matters. The nuclei did not receive financial aid from the PT and often sold party paraphernalia to finance their activities.

In many cases, PT nuclei succeeded base-level structures linked to PT feeder organizations, especially CEBs.\textsuperscript{165} ‘The PT’s conception of the nucleus...had an affinity with the organizational form of the base communities of the Catholic Church’, especially due to the ‘profoundly anticentralist bias’ underlying both organizational forms (Keck 1992: 104). Nuclei ‘mimicked’ the CEBs, according to Secco (2011: 78). Keck (1992) finds an association between rates of nucleus formation and CEB density (104).

\textit{Núcleo} membership peaked around five percent in 1982 but fell precipitously over the course of the 1980s (Secco 2011: 84, 263). Many \textit{núcleos} dissolved into campaign committees and local \textit{Diretórios}.\textsuperscript{166} While in 1982 the PT boasted roughly 1000 \textit{núcleos} with nearly 30,000 individuals participating (Secco 2011: 80), the number of \textit{núcleos} had fallen below 700 by the mid-1980s (Ribeiro 2010: 263) and to 200 by the mid-1990s (Ribeiro 2010: 87).

After 1981-2, the PT’s membership and formal infrastructure expanded in a relatively steady manner. At 0.36 percent in 1981, the PT’s membership as a proportion of the voting-age population rose to 0.44 percent in 1984, to 0.60 percent in 1988, and to 0.74 percent in 1995 (Ribeiro 2010: 244). With regard to party infrastructure, by 1985 the PT had organized municipal \textit{Diretórios} in 1100 of 4022 Brazilian municipalities (Secco 2011: 117). During the second half of the 1980s, the PT, largely due to the CUT’s expansion into rural and new urban areas, made considerable organizational advances outside São Paulo state. By 1989, the PT had established a municipal branch in nearly half (44 percent) of Brazil’s municipalities. In absolute terms, in 1989, the PT boasted 625,000 members (Keck 1992: 104).

\footnote{\textsuperscript{165} Interview with Frei Betto.} \footnote{\textsuperscript{166} Confusion over specific functions of nuclei within party, coupled with precarious intraparty communications, tended to erode nucleus formation over time’. Many nuclei were ‘absorbed into electoral committees in 1982 and never reconstituted’ (Keck 1992: 104).}
By the mid-1990s, the number approached one million.

Advocacy, selection effects, and the commitment of the PT’s early joiners

Many petistas characterize the party’s organizational push during the 1980s as an undertaking of Himalayan difficulty, achieved through force. Primarily, the difficulty stemmed from the need to recruit hundreds of thousands of new members. Given the PT’s low media access, early organizers had to engage in ‘person-to-person’ (corpo a corpo) recruiting, and given the party’s lack of resources, they could not offer selective benefits. Instead, they had to inspire individuals to devote their time and labor to the nascent PT. Further, in recruiting petistas, party-builders had to compete both with the MDB/PMDB, which urged Brazilians not to ‘waste their vote’ on the PT, and with the PCB, which boasted strong ties to sectors of organized labor and considered itself the authentic party of the Brazilian working class.

When recalling the initial years of development, petistas often stress the difficulty of satisfying the legal organizational requirements, and the negative electoral consequences of the voto vinculado. Keck (1992) writes that the PT gained legal status in 1980 against ‘seemingly impossible obstacles’ (Keck 1992: 93), referring to the legal organizational requirements for registry. Paulo Rocha, PT founder from Belém, Pará, recalled that in Pará, ‘we legalized the PT almost by force (meio na marra), with the creation [of offices] in eighteen municipalities’. The voto vinculado law, in effect for the 1982 elections, slowed the PT’s electoral progress by forcing the party to run viable legislative candidates in executive elections that they stood no chance of winning.

Rodríguez (n.d.) summarizes that the PT’s early organizational development involved ‘an extraordinary effort’ to incorporate ‘distinct groups and sectors across an extensive territory’ (Rodríguez n.d.: 225). Two founding petistas offered especially vivid accounts of early difficulties. First, in an unprompted statement from a published interview, Djalma Bom observed that although the conjuntura of the late 1970s facilitated and ‘contributed to the creation of the PT’,

‘the hardships were immense [emphasis Bom’s]. You cannot imagine how hard it was to create the PT’.

Later in the same interview, Bom reiterated the point: ‘You cannot imagine the difficulties of forming the PT. [People] thought we wouldn’t meet the legal requirements. But the thing went forward, with all the difficulties we had.... The legislation itself militated against (cerceava) the creation of political parties. We had to redouble forces (nós tivemos que nos desdobrar) in order to satisfy [them]’.

In the state of São Paulo alone, the PT, by late 1980, had to establish more than one-hundred municipal offices in order to achieve registry: ‘We would travel into the countryside, without anything, with an old Volkswagen Beetle, and we did not have money. During that period, at midnight, the tolls opened at midnight allowing us to pass for free, so we would wait... Everything was very difficult’.

One of the initial MDB defectors, Irma Passoni, described her 1982 campaign for federal deputy in similar terms:

‘I didn’t even spend much money. The little debt I accrued I paid off in the following term. The political campaign was assumed by all the militantes. There were people who made notes on papel de pão and gave them to people... It was really complicated, involving a lot of sacrifice and suffering as well. The difficulties increased when I was the PT’s secretary of Organization and I went to create the party’s provisory committees. If it was hard here in the capital, it was much worse in the interior. We were called communists, revolutionaries, I don’t know what. How were we going to organize the PT in the 120-something municipalities necessary [for legalizing the party]? It was an insane task. The initial construction of the PT in the interior was done by workers who had left the ABC and by members of the community. I was secretary of Organization without any estrutura, without a cent. We slept in the homes of community participants, we ate in their homes, and they often had little to eat. That’s how we built the PT. For the PT, the difficulty of early party-building also stemmed from the repressive atmosphere of the late 1970s and 1980s. Unlike the PMDB, the PT and its feeder groups (both before and after the PT’s formation) originated in a ‘hostile context’ (Rodríguez n.d.: 225). During the 1970s and 1980s, the Marxist left, autonomous urban unionists, and rural workers – at different periods, in different regions, and to varying degrees – suffered repression at the hands of government forces or local oligarchies. Although the general public often did not know about or give special salience to the repression of workers, the PT did. Campaign materials from the 1980s demonstrate that PT leaders frequently invoked the repression of workers in order to galvanize and grow the base.

172 Anticipating this, an internal tactical paper from Belo Horizonte, Minas Gerais in Christmas 1980 stresses: ‘[W]e seek to elect lots of municipal councilors, some mayors, and to avoid the defeat of deputy candidates without a chance of winning, who would stand a reasonable chance of winning for the PT if they ran for municipal councilor or mayor’ (‘Eleições em debate: Uma tática eleitoral para o PT’, from CSBH archive).

Marxists suffered much of the torture and murder under hard-line military rule. Autonomous urban labor, in contrast, suffered very little extreme repression. Military and police killed a relatively small number of urban new unionists from the mid-1970s to the mid-1980s (e.g., Manoel Fiel Filho in January 1976; two strikers in Leme, São Paulo, soon after the transition to civilian rule). More often, government forces intervened in unions to remove the leadership or broke up strikes, hurling political epithets at workers and their collaborators and arresting union leaders. In 1979, the Figueiredo government arrested dozens of top new union leaders, including Lula, and detained them for weeks in April/May 1980. In response, Lula and fellow new union leaders carried out a hunger strike, leading to their eventual release.

During the PT’s formative phase, no feeder group suffered greater repression than autonomous rural workers and the actors who helped organize them (above all, the Catholic 176 Passoni continues: ‘That’s also what happened in the national organization of the PT. The available estrutura was that of the mandatos of the deputies.... We depended on militantes at the regional level: in Piauí, Ceará, Rondônia, Acre... And that’s how we built the PT in all of Brazil, with the efforts of each individual, in each place, with each person’s resources. It was born from the forces that each person possessed...’ (interview with Irma Passoni in de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 318-9, 321).

Like their urban counterparts, autonomous rural workers frequently faced interventions and verbal abuse from military, police, and local elites. Yet for rural workers, forceful interventions only ‘scratched the surface’. In rural Brazil, local oligarchies enjoyed near total impunity due to the weakness of civil society, media, and the state. Between 1975 and 1989, these oligarchies, sometimes aided by military and police, murdered 1377 rural workers in agrarian conflicts (Petit 1996: 142)[177] Murders of rural workers spiked during the 1987-88 Constituent Assembly, when the push for land reform intensified. PT leader Hamilton Pereira recalls: ‘It was the period in which we were mobilizing to interfere in the Constituent Assembly, 1987-8, that the degree of violence in the land struggle climaxed (chega ao paroxismo). Every third day a union leader, a nun, a priest, someone involved in the land struggle was killed’[178] In the rural states where the early PT established a strong presence (e.g., Pará, Acre), ‘the PT necessarily reflected these struggles’ between rural workers and local oligarchies (Secco 2011: 46; also see Petit 1996 on the PT’s development in Pará).

The adverse conditions of the PT’s formation (scarce resources, low media access, repression, disadvantageous electoral laws) created powerful selection pressures. The party’s lack of access to resources and media and steep organizational barriers to entry made early party-building non-remunerative and highly labor-intensive. Repression raised the cost of participation for certain feeder groups, especially rural workers in the Northern region and certain Marxist networks. These difficulties, along with the party’s dim short-term electoral prospects at the national level, ‘weeded out’ political opportunists and selected for ‘true 177 In addition to the murders, local oligarchies and allied military and police frequently intervened in rural worker strikes and demonstrations, displaying force and verbally assaulting both union organizers and the poor, often illiterate rank-and-file. A rural CUT leader, PT founder, and senatorial candidate recalled a representative episode in which military officers halted a mass demonstration of autonomous rural workers in Rurópolis, Pará in May 1980: ‘We were surrounded and monitored by military personnel on all sides... It seemed like the end of the world because there was enormous persecution. They invented things that I didn’t understand... When they said that we were communist, I didn’t know what communism was. I didn’t understand anything’ (de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 170).

believers’, or the ideologically committed. Given the low short-term benefits and often high short-term costs of participation, individuals without strong ideological convictions, by and large, did not join the PT, even if they leaned left politically.

PT members and observers have noted as much. Bruhn (2008) treats the PT’s early development as comparable to that of Mexico’s PRD. Citing Greene (2007), she writes that both were ‘antisystem parties, founded in the course of a struggle against an authoritarian regime and with the explicit purpose of confronting that regime.... Such parties are of interest only to people with extreme views who are driven by ideology more than the desire for power.... They are natural-born protesters’ (165; emphasis not in the original). Djalma Bom recalled in an interview that ‘the PT militância used to be warlike (aguerrida)... Things were much harder, but we did things with much more happiness and solidarity (integração) (de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 95). In a 2008 interview, Olívio Dutra, one of the PT’s central founders, stressed, ‘[a] party that enters the government runs the risk of...rapidly attracting opportunists of all stripes who want benefits’[179] The PT, he observed, ‘did not arise from public office, either legislative or executive, but from the struggle of the Brazilian people’ (de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 124). A PT founder and campaign consultant similarly observed that while most Brazilian parties depended on clientelism, the PT, with no executive power, relied on a social base driven by conviction, not material incentives.[180]

But what conviction drove early petistas? In order to fuel local party-building efforts, party leaders must provide some type of incentive to activists, and if leaders cannot distribute selective material incentives (jobs, money), they must offer collective incentives: an identity and/or set of goals shared widely by party members, which transcend individuals’ desire for wealth, power, and status (Panebianco 1988: 24).

Petistas did not rally around a single positive ideology (about which more below). Members and feeder networks ran the gamut of left ideologies, from orthodox Marxism to pro-capitalist social democracy. Equally, petistas did not coordinate around the goal of ending the military dictatorship. If the desire to end military rule had fundamentally animated petistas, they would have joined the PMDB, which also opposed the military regime, advocated a swift end to military rule, and, crucially, possessed far greater electoral clout than the PT.

If not united by a specific, positive ideological vision, or by simple opposition to the military dictatorship, what positive goal and/or identity did early petistas coordinate around? Why were such a diverse range of individuals willing to devote time and labor to an electorally marginal party-building project?

From the PT’s inception, PT leaders branded the party, and members viewed the party, as a novelty in Brazilian history: the first authentically popular expression in a society perpetually dominated by elites.\footref{181} The PT’s popular origins distinguished it from all other Brazilian parties, including the opposition PMDB. During the PT’s early years, campaign literature explicitly ‘lumped the PMDB in’ with the rest of the bourgeois political establishment. Petistas characterized the PMDB as a domesticated and artificial opposition, cut from the same elite cloth as all the other parties. A 1982 flier for a group of PT candidates from Rio de Janeiro, for example, described both the PDS and the PMDB as the parties of ‘the landowners and factory owners’.\footref{182} In contrast, the PT, to quote one campaign booklet, was oposição pra valer (‘an opposition that counts’).

In an illustrative quotation from a 2008 interview, PT leader from Minas Gerais, Luiz Dulci, explained why the PT, in its earliest days, did not dissolve into, or at least ally with, the progressive Tendência Popular of the MDB:

‘Look, it wasn’t due to differences in political platform. There were differences in that respect, but they were surmountable (contornaveis). In my opinion, the root problem, even if no one recognized it openly, was the forma de fazer política. When asked, ‘In what sense?’, he replied that ‘the parlamentares of the MDB did in fact have deep democratic convictions and sincere social commitments, but theirs was a traditional vision of the party...with an exclusively institutional conception of politics. They had causes in common with Lula and with us [the PT], but they did not give the same weight as we did to social movements, nor to the whole of civil society; they didn’t think it was possible to create a party from the bottom up, truly participatory, in which the popular classes acted directly and above all became politically educated in order to lead the state one day. We wanted more than to restore representative democracy...We wanted to give [representative democracy] a new quality, making each citizen, in their daily life, an active political subject’.

Early campaign materials focus on the popular character of the PT, not the characteristics of individual PT candidates, who often shared platforms verbatim and ran unitarily. Countless homemade and party-produced pamphlets and fliers emphasize that the PT’s distinctiveness lay in its popular origins. These texts claimed that political change could only come de baixo para cima (from the bottom up), and that the PT alone involved the masses in the political process. A 1982 campaign flier for Roberto Martins, PT candidate from Bahia, stated that ‘[a]t this electoral juncture, the PT distinguishes itself from the other opposition parties, calling all the people to organization and struggle’.

Early PT slogans included, ‘A worker votes for a worker’, and the Portuguese rhyme, ‘Vote number three [the PT’s ballot number], the rest is bourgeois’.

The PT’s authentically popular origins gave it a mística that resonated across the left spectrum, including with Marxists. During the initial years especially, the PT’s unique sociological profile attracted a wide range of left groups, including many on the Marxist left. In the words of one Marxist ex-petista, the PT’s ‘founding myth’ of popular authenticity ‘permitted incredible diversity’.

that although Marxists did not agree with many of the PT’s positions, the PT was the party that Marxists had been waiting for, ‘dreaming about’:

‘[In the 1960s], we wanted [a party with a real social base] but there were no workers, no laborers, not even masses. [There was a] ferrada repression, a smaller working class, unions with pelégos... So we said: ‘Look, the PT is the party we dreamed of, the party we always fought for, a party of the workers, so we don’t need to remain outside. We don’t need to fight for the complete line today, tomorrow. It’s a process. What’s important is for the party to be of the workers, class-based. Our role here is to fight to make it internally democratic, anti-capitalist, protective (defensor) of democratic socialism...”

Although the PT would spend the 1980s almost entirely out of government, the PT’s governing ethos, established later in the party’s history, would reflect a continued fundamental emphasis on popular participation and empowerment. When the PT began to win important positions in the late 1980s and 1990s, party elites trumpeted the modo petista de governar, which centered on popular participation, over any particular ideological or programmatic goal (Samuels 2004). The party’s most innovative and influential experiment in municipal governance (Porto Alegre, 1989-2005) achieved world renown due to participatory budgeting, not to specific social policies such as education or health reform.

In sum, from the beginning, the PT’s popular identity, and the goal of putting the reins of government in workers’ hands, animated petistas and, crucially, extended their time horizons. Petistas sought to transform Brazil’s historically elite-dominated political system and knew that success, given the PT’s utter marginality in the 1980s, would require dogged persistence. Accordingly, party leaders explicitly downplayed the significance of particular, short-term electoral victories, keeping their gaze fixed on radical political transformation. Describing his 1982 campaign for governor of Rio Grande do Sul, for example, Olívio Dutra stated:

1We had a disposição incrível. A very spontaneous thing.... We clearly understood that [the public] machine and the state were responsible for all the inequalities, the injustices, and the situation that we had to change. There was a lot of heart, excitement, a very rooted conviction, due to the social struggles, that the people had to play the leading role in history and that the PT had to carry this proposal forward, independently of whether we won the elections’ (emphasis not in the original).\(^{188}\)

Keck (1992) observes that after the disastrous elections of 1982 (about which more below), petistas rededicated themselves to union and social movement activity, ‘as if the election campaign had represented a deviation from the normal goals of party activity’ (153; emphasis Keck’s). A leading early petista from Minas Gerais recalled that ‘[w]e wanted a mass party but organic, activist, not just a party of public opinion. A party that didn’t just operate during election season’\(^{189}\) In a 1986 internal PT interview, party leader Gumercindo Milhorem Neto echoed an oft-voiced sentiment: ‘Winning an election doesn’t mean winning power. Power in São Paulo, in the cities and in the states in general, belongs to the large property owners: the owners of car factories, of bus businesses, of transportation businesses, the big ranchers, the big bankers; these are the powerful’\(^{190}\) The PT’s 1989 presidential campaign reflected the party’s continued non-electoralist character, as party leaders knowingly took electorally suboptimal stands on potentially decisive issues (Hunter 2010: 112). In particular, Lula and the national elite remained explicitly socialist, chose not to pursue an alliance with the PMDB, and refused to condemn the increasingly aggressive MST, recognizing that such decisions would provide fodder for the conservative opposition (Hunter 2010: 112).

The above notwithstanding, the non-Downsian character of the early PT should not be overstated. The internal life of the PT, almost from the beginning, did revolve around elections. As noted above, the party’s main grassroots structures for dialogue and debate outside of elections, the núcleos de base, only ever involved a small minority of party members and weakened considerably very early in the party’s history. Secco (2011) argues that ‘[t]he ephemeral nature of the nuclei had an obvious cause. Most activists got excited about (se empolgava com) electoral campaigns’ (Secco 2011: 85). After a couple of years, he states, ‘elected officials and [t]he leaders of tendências and union organizations made careers, and the bases went home’ (Secco 2011: 77). Keck (1992) summarizes that, by the late 1980s, the PT’s ‘desire to maintain active grassroots party organizations outside of election periods ha[d] gone largely unfulfilled’ (121).

Organizational expansion and electoral progress

Most of the PT’s electoral progress during the 1980s followed from organizational expansion, at the state and federal as well as municipal levels. The PT could only run municipal candidates ‘where it had a diretório’, and for federal, state, and local candidates alike, ‘the presence of a local party organization was important for mounting a campaign’ (Keck 1992: 152). Activist networks ‘kicked into gear’ for elections at all levels. Municipal and zonal Diretórios served as local campaign headquarters (bases de campanha). Given the PT’s lack of access to media and resources, the PT’s votes, throughout the formative phase, tended to come either from PT militantes or from the persuadable voters they managed to reach in person. Consequently, in electoral terms, the early PT performed best in its organizational bastions (e.g., the ABC paulista). Keck (1992) finds that in the São Paulo state election in 1982, the PT received less than two percent of the vote in 97 percent of municipalities without a PT Diretório, and over five percent of the vote in 57 percent of municipalities with one (152). Meneguello (1989) finds, more generally, that throughout the 1980s, the PT’s electoral results closely tracked pre-election organizational strength. In places with local PT offices and large PT memberships, the PT performed well, independently of other factors, even rally attendance.

191 Interviews with Venturi and de Filippi.
The PT’s slow progress in large executive elections, far from reflecting organizational weakness, demonstrated that even an exceptionally strong grassroots organization could not compete with the media empires and patronage machines at the disposal of PT opponents. One party founder and intellectual recalled that for major executive elections, the Horário Gratuito alone mattered more than the militância. Yet in the smaller elections, especially municipal elections and legislative elections at the state and federal levels, corpo a corpo campaigning played a key role – often a fundamental, decisive role. Consequently, the PT’s performance in these lower-level elections tracked the party’s steady organizational progress, both in traditional strongholds and in parts of the national territory where the PT developed new linkages with autonomous workers and other civil society actors. In its first decade in the Chamber, for example, the PT experienced an ‘incremental growth in support’ (Keck 1992: 160), progressing from eight (1982) to sixteen (1986) to thirty-five (1990) elected deputies.

Just as the PT’s organizational strength contributed to electoral success, election campaigns and electoral success contributed to the PT’s organizational strength (Keck 1992: 123-66; see also Bartolini 1983). Save the PT’s first major organizational push, when party-builders set out to satisfy the legal organizational requirements for registry, the periods of greatest organizational expansion occurred both in the lead-up to and wake of elections. In large measure, organizational expansion (particularly membership increases) during and after elections resulted from the PT’s heightened visibility and – following the 1985, 1986, and 1988 cycles – increased electoral credibility.

Equally, however, the PT intentionally ‘campaigned to organize’ (Keck 1992: 123-66). Party leaders consciously used elections, especially large executive elections (e.g., presidential, São Paulo gubernatorial, and mayoral elections).
Paulo gubernatorial), to enlarge the permanent party organization, capitalizing not only on heightened visibility and increased credibility, but also on campaign infrastructure. In the lead-up to the 1982 elections, for example, José Dirceu wrote that ‘the electoral campaign [of 1982] will serve for us to expand the organized bases of the PT, doing recruitment drives and nucleus formation simultaneously’

Also in the lead-up to the election, the São Paulo state Diretório’s Secretary of Press and Publicity (Divulgação) emphasized in a campaign strategy proposal that the grupos de apoio for the 1982 elections should become tomorrow’s PT nuclei.

The trend continued for the remainder of the decade (and beyond). After the 1985 mayoral elections, the PT carried out recruitment drives (Keck 1992: 109, 156). A Manual de Grupo de Apoio for the 1986 congressional elections, written as a dialogue, asks whether support groups can become permanent after the campaign and answers ‘yes’, providing relevant instructions.

In a letter to PT militantes before the 1986 elections, Jorge Baptista emphasized that ‘[t]he electoral campaign must serve the organization and consolidation of our party: the PT’.

A flier supporting João Antônio for state deputy in 1986 read: ‘...[W]e choose to run a candidate, envisioning the strengthening of the PT and the formação of new militantes, so that the party contributes to the advancement and politicization of popular movements and unions’.

A flier for Luiza Erundina’s 1988 São Paulo mayoral campaign reads: ‘The candidacy of Luiza Erundina synthesizes the PT’s objectives in the electoral progress: win the elections and, beyond that, impel party-building (impulsionar a construção

Organizational strength and the survival of crisis

Not only did organizational strength enable the PT to make steady (albeit slow) electoral progress in an adverse context, the PT’s grassroots capacity and ethos fortified the party amid early electoral crisis. The PT suffered its most crushing setback very early, in the 1982 municipal, state, and congressional elections. The party had entered the electoral season, its first, with great optimism due to bottom-up fervor, the ‘great energy of struggle’ (energia grande de luta)²⁰⁰ and the unexpectedly large rally audiences associated with the PT’s 1982 campaigns (Keck 1992: 141-4).

In particular, given Lula’s national profile and strong performance in the 1982 gubernatorial debates, petistas approached the São Paulo gubernatorial election with high hopes. Most activists believed that Lula would win the governorship, arguably the second most important office in the country, and certainly the most important of the offices contested in 1982. ‘Everyone who participated...in the electoral campaign’, recalled 1982 federal deputy candidate Djalma Bom (São Paulo), ‘expected [Lula to be elected governor]. And it wasn’t for nothing because the largest rallies were done by the PT and Lula.... That created the expectation, you know?’²⁰¹

Yet Lula placed a distant fourth in the São Paulo gubernatorial race. Olívio Dutra, probably the second most important leader in the party, placed last in the Rio Grande do Sul gubernatorial race. The PT did elect municipal councilors (vereadores) in local strongholds across the country, in São Paulo state, major urban centers in and out of the South and Southeast

(e.g., Bahia), and even remote, rural states such as Acre, Amazonas, Pará, and Rondônia (Secco 2011: 50). Yet in a country with more than 4000 municipalities, the PT won only two mayoralties, in the small cities of Diadêma, bordering São Bernardo do Campo, and in Santa Quitéria do Maranhão. In the Chamber of Deputies, the PT elected a paltry eight legislators, three-and-a-half percent of the total.

Keck (1992) calls the 1982 results a ‘profound shock and disappointment to the PT’ (Keck 1992: 149), which ‘the PT experienced as a severe defeat’ (152-3), and after which ‘deep disappointment and a kind of collective depression’ set in (156). In the post-election analysis, party leaders concluded, among other things, that the 1982 campaigns had distanced the party from its civil society roots. The party initiated a ‘return to the base’ and a renewed emphasis on ‘social action’ (Keck 1992: 197), both in the organized labor sector and more broadly (Diretas Já!, the landless workers’ movement). Unbeknownst to PT leaders, this reinvestment in civil society would reap electoral dividends just a few years later.

With no elected offices to occupy, top party leaders (e.g., Lula, Olívio Dutra, Jacó Bittar), rededicated themselves to the autonomous labor movement. As discussed earlier, in 1983, they founded the CUT, beginning a highly successful effort to broaden and strengthen the new unionism over the next few years. The PT’s renewed focus on social action quickly came to involve other civil society actors and movements as well. In 1984, a set of regional, previously uncoordinated landless worker movements joined to create the national Landless Workers’ Movement (MST). Land reform had already become an important element of the PT platform – and would only become more important as the 1980s progressed, as the movement strengthened and the push for land reform intensified. Although the MST eschewed partisan involvement, landless workers and rural activists predominantly supported the PT as of the mid-1980s. By the late 1980s, the PT ‘[had been] affirmed as the land struggle’s main partisan reference’, especially given Luis Carlos Prestes’ exit from the PCB.

The PT’s involvement in Diretas Já!, however, played a more central role in the party’s post-1982 rebound. The 1983-4 period gave rise to Diretas Já!, the largest social movement in Brazilian history. The movement arose in early 1983 amid economic crisis. A combination of economic slowdown and extreme inflation eroded the military’s legitimacy, and anti-regime sentiment intensified. A wide range of actors, from political parties to movements and civil society organization, joined to press for direct presidential elections. At its peak in early 1984, the Diretas Já! claimed 1.5 million participants.

While the PMDB led Diretas Já! at the institutional level, the PT led ‘on the street’ (Secco 2011: 113). In November 1983, the PT filled São Paulo’s gigantic Pacaembu Stadium for the first Diretas Já mass protest. An early petista observed that no other party could have begun to mobilize such a massive crowd (interview with Alli). The PT’s street-level leadership during Diretas Já! enhanced the party’s status in civil society, as did the PT’s decision to boycott the indirect election of 1985 (about which more below). Secco (2011) writes that due to the PT’s boycott, ‘its number of supporters and presence in social movements grew’ (e.g., in student movements) (Secco 2011: 119).

After the amendment for direct elections (the Dante de Oliveira Amendment) narrowly lost in a congressional vote, the PMDB accepted the result and nominated a leader, Tancredo Neves, to run in the indirect presidential election of 1985. The PT deliberated whether to send its federal deputies to the Electoral College to vote for Neves. In order to reach a decision, the PT held an internal vote. Twenty-thousand petistas participated, and an overwhelming majority, eighty-six percent, voted to boycott the Electoral College.

204 In 1983, the Brazilian economy ground to a halt, and annual inflation reached nearly 250 percent.
Months before the mayoral elections of 1985, the PT’s second electoral cycle, ‘many [PT leaders] expressed doubt that the party would last out the year’ (Keck 1992: 235). The failure of the Diretas Já movement, as well as internal conflicts over the decision to reject a compromise solution, had ‘produced yet another internal crisis’ (Keck 1992: 154). The PT’s perceived inability to translate civil society strength into institutional efficacy ‘was causing a full-scale crisis of identity in the party’ (ibid). The mayoral elections ‘were widely seen as the great test of the party’s organizational viability. Unless the results were a vast improvement over the party’s performance in 1982, party activists would more than likely opt to concentrate their energies entirely on movement organizations’, not the PT (ibid).

Yet the PT performed unexpectedly well. The party had mounted campaigns in nearly every state capital, and petista candidates registered breakout performances across the board. The PT’s Maria Luiza Fontanelle won the mayoralty of Fortaleza (Brazil’s fifth largest city), and unlike in 1982, PT candidates finished second or third in a number of other major municipal contests. In Vitória, Espírito Santo and Aracajú, Sergipe, for example, the PT placed second, and in the all-important São Paulo mayoral race, the PT’s Eduardo Suplicy finished a close third with twenty percent of the vote.

In part, the PT’s performance simply reflected the party’s new civil society ties, developed since 1982. Crucially, however, the PT had also begun to solidify a distinctive party brand. Although the PT’s firm stand against indirect election led to the party’s short-term marginalization in the spheres of institutional politics and the national media, it helped cement the party’s image as a principled political actor, less willing to compromise for short-term political gain than the center-left, establishment (situacionista) PMDB. Secco (2011) writes that ‘this choice [to boycott the Electoral College]...reinforced [the PT’s] external identity as a group of social opposition’ (119). The PT benefited, electorally, from its enhanced stature among pro-democracy advocates, receiving a large portion of the ‘protest vote’.
After 1985, the PT suffered major electoral disappointments (e.g., Lula’s losses in 1989 and 1994) but never ran a serious risk of electoral collapse, as in 1982 or 1985. The party made steady electoral progress for the next decade. In the 1986 congressional elections, the PT doubled its congressional contingent, jumping from eight to sixteen federal deputies. The newly elected deputies included Lula, Olívio Dutra, and several other major party leaders. Former Marxist and PT leader, José Dirceu, won a seat on the São Paulo state assembly.

The 1988 elections ‘were a great leap forward’. The party elected thirty-one mayors, up from one in 1985 and 1982. Luiza Erundina won the PT’s major executive post, the São Paulo mayoralty. The PT won three state capitals (SP, Porto, Vitória), six mid-sized industrial cities in SP state (including three in the ABCD region), and three small cities in Minas Gerais (Hunter 2010: 81). The PT also performed well in rural districts where the party had ‘worked closely with the landless movement and/or rural unions, labor organizations’ (Keck 1992: 157).

After 1988, the PT, and especially Lula, became perennial contenders in major national and subnational elections. Lula came within a ‘hair’ of winning the 1989 presidential contest, and placed second again in 1994 (about which more below). In 1990, the PT doubled its legislative contingent a second time, electing thirty-five federal deputies and winning over ten percent (10.2) of Chamber vote share, and in 1992, the PT, despite losing control of the São Paulo mayoralty, elected fifty-four mayors (up from thirty-six in 1988) and won its first governorships: the Federal District (Brasília) and Espírito Santo.

205Thus, after four years dedicated to a base, the PT’s top national leaders – in Keck’s (1992) words, the party’s ‘best-known and most legitimate spokespersons’ (224) – was returning to institutional politics.

206Diadêma, Santo André, São Bernardo do Campo

207The race, in a commonly used phrase, pitted ‘unorganized Brazil’ (Collor) against organized Brazil’ (Lula). Lula won in the cities, with the votes of organized workers and sympathetic middle-class progressives, but he fared extremely poorly among the unorganized poor and working class, especially in the undeveloped Northeast, where Collor and allied conservative patronage and media machines dominated. Coronelismo, both material and electronic, narrowly won the election for Collor.
Chapter 3

Avoiding schism in the early PT: the indispensability of Lula da Silva

So far, the chapter has examined the causes and consequences of the early PT’s organizational strength. Low access to resources and media created an electoral incentive for the PT to build a strong organization, while access to civil society – union, church, and Marxist structures – gave the PT the capacity to succeed. Due primarily to these conditions, the early PT developed a large base of activists and members, organized locally, with a high level of commitment to the party’s aims. Organizational strength accounted for the early PT’s steady electoral development, and the party’s grassroots capacity and ethos fortified it amid early electoral crisis.

The previous section identified the PT’s perceived popular essence as the main collective incentive fueling early petistas. Members’ identification with and commitment to the PT’s popular character and narrative, however, did not eliminate centrifugal forces within the party. Indeed, the sincere ideological commitments of petistas, while useful for elongating activist time horizons and preventing electoral collapse, arguably made the party base less pragmatic and thus threatened cohesion. As a rule, sectarianism plagues the most ideological parties and movements (e.g., Marxism), given that internal currents, despite differing from each other in seemingly minor ways, often prioritize ideological purity over political pragmatism and compromise.

Moreover, PT blocs and factions differed in major, not minor, ways. From inception, the PT was furiously expanding, first, to achieve official status and, second, to prepare for the 1982 elections. In this process, the party prioritized territorial reach over internal coherence. Leaders wanted to incorporate as many societal actors as possible, from across the left spectrum. In order to attract the maximum range and number of feeder groups, the party cúpula openly welcomed and embraced internal difference and, in order not to alienate any important actors on the radical or moderate left, refrained from espousing a specific ideology. In the words of one Marxist ex-
petista, if party leaders had officially endorsed any ‘systematic analysis’ of the nation’s current ills and proper direction, they would have alienated important groups.\footnote{208}

The vast majority of early PT leaders, new unionists included, endorsed socialism in a broad sense. Yet party leaders faced a difficult balancing act. On the one hand, they rejected rigid Marxist doctrine, which just a fraction of the leadership and base espoused. On the other, they sought to attract Marxists by making the PT’s official ideology unspecific, open-ended, and hence contestable. A vague petista socialism, or ‘democratic socialism’, resulted. PT leaders, including Lula, openly identified themselves and the party as socialist, but they defined their socialism primarily in negative terms, ‘as a rejection of bureaucratic socialism and social democracy’ (Ribeiro 2010: 214).\footnote{209} The more positive formulations of petista socialism possessed little specific content: the emancipation of workers by workers, to be realized in practice through internal and external democracy, not ‘worked out’ \textit{a priori}.\footnote{210} Lula articulated \textit{o socialismo petista} in his address at the PT’s first \textit{Encontro Nacional} in 1981.

The PT succeeded in attracting a very heterogeneous set of actors, who not only differed in ideology, but also hailed from disparate regions, belonged to different socioeconomic strata, and identified with different subcultures. PT members and factions spanned unreformed Marxism and the moderate left, the popular and middle sectors, the private and public sectors, the full range of education levels, and developed and undeveloped areas of the country. Secco (2011) emphasizes the ‘enormous regional diversity’ of the early PT, observing that local PT networks varied widely from state to state, and even municipality to municipality, in their civil societal and ideological profiles. Echoing the analysis of Keck (1992), he stresses that the early PT ‘was not just one thing’, but instead a patchwork of local organizations and subcultures, the character of each local branch and activist network largely determined by the identity of the leading feeder group/s in the area.

Although the PT’s internal heterogeneity produced a range of conflicts and tensions, differences between PT moderates (primarily new unionists) and radicals (overwhelmingly Marxists) posed the greatest challenge to cohesion. The early PT housed a large number of loosely organized new unionists and left Catholics and a large number of small but very well-organized Marxist parties and organizations. From inception, the PT, in order to attract Marxists, recognized the direito de tendência, which permitted the existence, within the PT, of formally organized factions (tendências) that possessed specific ideological profiles and sought to influence the PT’s programmatic direction and occupy both public-sector and party positions. The party thus originated as a party of, not with, tendências. ‘Tendências’, Ribeiro (2010) writes, ‘are part of the petista DNA’ (186).

Crucially, the PT leadership also tacitly permitted dupla militância, enforcing virtually no restrictions on tendências’ activities outside the party. Tendências were allowed, although not encouraged, to remain separate parties and explicitly to treat the PT as a tactical party in the service of separate, revolutionary ends. Most did. On a standard view within most Marxist tendências, new unionists lacked full class consciousness and, barring ‘conversion’, would never pursue revolutionary ends. These tendências thus treated the PT, either explicitly or implicitly, as an electoral front and regarded their own participation in the PT as a ‘tactic’, not a ‘strategy’. Indeed, new unionists did not subscribe to Marxism, at least its more revolutionary tenets. According to one Marxist PT founder, new unionists feared Marxists’ revolutionary discourse. In one characteristic reaction to radical members of the PT in Pará, a rural union leader described the discussions surrounding the formation of the CUT in 1983: ‘There was a part [of the text synthesizing the discussions] that talked about getting into power. The language was very... [trails off] I think they were people linked to the MR-8’. Workers’ discomfort with Marxists resulted not only from ideological differences, but also from interpersonal barriers rooted in class difference. New unionists’ political views had arisen, primarily, from working-class and union experience, not from reading and education. PT workers often seemed not to respect PT Marxists, viewing them as disconnected intellectuals, materially comfortable in their private lives, and limited in their experience of genuine struggle. In early 1981, an internal PT document, circulated to clandestine Marxist parties associated with the party, tellingly read: ‘If you want to enter the party that the working class, the actual working class, is organizing, fine. You will be welcomed. But don’t come as owners of the truth, dictators of the rules for the masses’ (Teixeira 1981, cited in Secco 2011: 95; emphasis not in the original).

Yet PT workers also, at times, seemed insecure about, and even resentful of, Marxists’ higher education levels. According to one Marxist PT founder, new unionists ‘knew nothing about political theories, philosophies’, and Lula, initially, ‘[was] so conscious of his origins that he didn’t want to talk to intellectuals and students. A Marxist ex-\textit{petista} noted that, early in the party’s history, Lula openly admitted to having no idea what Marx or Lenin argued.

For all these reasons, ‘...there was, in the PT, a kind of base-level, anti-intellectual worker culture, even though \textit{[the party]} had attracted many intellectuals since its founding’ (Secco 2011: 94). A former urban guerrilla and initial PT enthusiast recalled that at an early PT meeting in Rio de Janeiro, the new unionists in control of the meeting did not allow Marxist intellectuals to take the microphone, only allowing \textit{operários} to speak.

Critiques of the radical \textit{tendências} by moderate \textit{petistas}, Ribeiro (2010) writes, ‘are as old as the \textit{tendências}’ themselves (186). From the party’s early days, such critiques crop up regularly in internal party communications and usually center on allegations of duplicity, insularity, and rigid dogmatism. Interestingly, new unionists encouraged the formation of \textit{núcleos de base}, in part, to create union- and church-based counterweights to the Marxist \textit{tendências} (Secco 2011: 78).

*****

In sum, given the internal weight of ideologues in the PT as a whole, and the serious ideological and sociological differences between PT groups, schism posed a threat. In the words of Hamilton Pereira, Marxist PT leader,

\begin{quote}
‘Initially, [the PT was] very strong and very fragile. It \textit{[was]} strong because it \textit{[was]} the meeting place between the [Marxist] left...and a nascent workers’ movement. Now, \textit{[it was]} very fragile because it was...born from a break with both the III International and social democracy... Only the PT \textit{[was]} more complex than that. It incorporate\textit{[d]} people with a Church background and the unionists... What was the result of this? The threat of low cohesion, of fragmentation (\textit{da falta de coesão, da fragmentação}).’

Indeed, on numerous occasions during the formative phase, the PT seemed on the verge of schism. Keck (1992) summarizes that in the first half of the 1980s...it often appeared that the difficulties in resolving internal and environmental challenges would destroy the party’ (18). In particular, throughout the 1980s and first half of the 1990s, conflicts between moderate PT leaders and radical elements of the PT base threatened the party’s integrity. The remainder of the section describes the PT’s central internal conflicts and analyzes why the PT avoided fatal schism during the formative phase.

From the beginning, petistas resolved their differences, primarily, in a formal internal arena, the sistema político petista. In 1980, the PT established a formal internal democracy in which the rank-and-file could assert control, directly and indirectly, over internal dialogue and governance (Keck 1992: 91). Drawing on aspects of both new unions and CEBs, the PT, from the beginning, put a premium on participatory democracy: ‘The PT’s organizational proposta was based, essentially, on the principle of participatory democracy’ (Secco 2011: 81). While the PT’s flexible ideology would foster a sense among the PT’s internal groups, including the more radical minority groups, that they could influence the party’s direction, the party’s formal and informal participatory democratic institutions would provide channels for the bottom-up shaping of party policy and principle.222

The formal rules of the sistema político petista would go virtually unchanged until 2001. These rules combined proportional representation (with a ten-percent minimum) for forming the national and subnational offices, or Diretórios, and winner-takes-all majoritarianism for forming executive committees, or Executivas. All PT members were eligible to participate in official party meetings, Encontros, at the municipal or (in large cities) zonal level. Municipal and zonal Encontros sent delegates to state Encontros, which in turn sent representatives to the national Encontro. At every level, Encontro attendees elected representatives to the national, state, municipal, and zonal offices, or Diretórios, by proportional representation. Tendências had to receive ten percent of the Encontro vote in order to receive a minimum of representation in the corresponding Diretório.

Encontro members typically voted as part of tendências, the ‘parties of the petista political system’ (Ribeiro 2010: 186). The tendência or coalition of tendências that held the absolute majority in a Diretório appointed all members of the corresponding executive committee, or Executiva. Only in Rio Grande do Sul did the state Diretório allot internal executive posts via proportional representation.

A large number of Marxist feeder organizations became tendências immediately upon joining, including the particularly effective and influential Trotskyist groups, (Causa Operária, Convergência Socialista, O Trabalho). Given the number and efficacy of Marxist tendências, ‘the tendências’, in informal PT parlance, became shorthand for the ‘revolutionary leftist currents and parties acting within the PT’ (Keck 1992: 118-9).

During the 1980-2 period, Marxist tendências exerted enormous influence internally, both in organizing the party at the local level and in shaping the party program. As already noted, in the initial rush to achieve registry and expand the ground organization in preparation for the 1982 elections, the national leadership devoted scarce energy to issues of programmatic coherence and internal discipline, partly due to lack of time (Keck 1992: 121), partly in order to avoid imposing on segments of the base. This state of affairs created fertile terrain for well-organized Marxist petistas who wished to control the party message and program in their local bastions.

223 Interview with Raul Pont in de Moraes and Fortes (eds., 2008: 225).
On the PT’s official analysis, the incoherence – and, at times, the militant stridency – of the party’s November 1982 campaign harmed the party electorally. After the electoral debacle, the internal influence of Marxists became a top concern for the PT’s moderate, largely new unionist leadership. Despite their numbers, moderate PT leaders lacked the discipline, and internal focus/efficacy of the PT’s left tendências. Party leaders concluded that the interaction of Marxist efficacy and organizational decentralization, and the resulting absence of a single and minimally pragmatic party line, had thwarted and would continue to thwart the party’s external electoral ambitions. By underinvesting in the luta interna, moderates had allowed radicals’ undue influence over the party message, ultimately handicapping the party at the ballot box. Moving forward, electoral progress would require a minimum of coherence and pragmatism in the party program.

The 1982 election marked a watershed in PT history for two reasons. First, PT moderates created a large, formal, centrist bloc, the Articulação dos 113 (henceforth Articulação). In creating the Articulação, the PT’s moderate center set out to formalize and consolidate its dominance, with a view toward imposing at least a modicum of programmatic moderation on the entire party. On Keck’s (1992) summary analysis, the founders of Articulação sought to create a ‘unifying political center’ (Secco 2011: 93) and ‘impose a relatively unified vision of the party’s nature and goals’ (Keck 1992: 114). ‘The formation of Articulação was an attempt to consolidate leadership of the party.... It represented an effort to impose a relatively unified vision of the party’s nature and goals, not to the point of eliminating factional differences, but at least as the expression of a clear majority’ (Keck 1992: 114). Rodríguez (n.d.) similarly characterizes the Articulação as an attempt by Lula and allies to formalize their status as the PT’s dominant coalition. Ricardo Kotscho simply called the electoral setback of 1982 proved ‘crucial in [the PT’s] early development’ (Keck 1992: 124), leading to a new ‘period’ of PT history according to some. From talk by Lincoln Secco at PT Diretório Zonal in Pinheiros, São Paulo city.
Second, as discussed earlier, during the same period (late 1982 to early 1983), PT labor leaders, many simultaneously involved in the creation of Articulação, ‘returned to the base’ on the view that the party had grown too distant from its civil society roots. As a central element of the ‘return to the base’, PT labor leaders created and nurtured the CUT. PT moderates hoped and intended, with the CUT initiative, to increase the internal leverage of moderates by strengthening the new unionism. Thus, both the creation of the Articulação and the ‘return to the base’ ‘were attempts to consolidate [leadership] of the party in the hands of labor movement leaders and those they considered their allies’ (Keck 1992: 153).

Articulação’s founding leaders spanned new unionists, left Catholics, and Marxist leaders and intellectuals. Lula did not formally join Articulação but, according to Secco (2011), led the bloc ‘symbolically’ (93). Articulação’s leaders included all the ‘strongest personalities’ and ‘main names of the period’ (Ribeiro 2010: 187), including Lula (informally), Olívio Dutra, and Benedita da Silva. According to Marxist petista Hamilton Pereira, radicals who joined the Articulação did so as ‘a service to the consolidation of the PT’ (F and F 2008: 265).

In June of 1983, 113 party leaders published the Articulação’s manifesto, the Manifesto dos 113. In positive terms, the manifesto continued in the tradition of petista socialism. Articulação affirmed socialism but kept its positive vision vague and open-ended, to be contested and realized in practice through mass participation and democracy, both in and out of the PT.

In the manifesto, the Articulação also situated itself between the ‘vanguardist’ and ‘elitist’ poles of the party – on the one hand, the Marxist tendências and, on the other, more pragmatic, conservative sectors that placed too much emphasis on short-term electoral politics and insufficient emphasis on the party’s civil society linkages (Keck 1992: 114; Secco 2011: 94).

In truth, however, the goal of reining in the Marxists constituted the primary motivation for creating Articulação. While affirming socialism, the Manifesto dos 113 defined Articulação in clear opposition to traditional Marxism. Various tenets and characteristics of Marxism received censure, including bureaucratization, vanguardism, the treatment of the PT as a tactical front, and the treatment of the present conjuntura as an early, bourgeois-democratic ‘stage’ in Brazil’s development toward communism (Secco 2011: 94; Ribeiro 2010: 214). The manifesto reserved its most pointed criticisms for petistas de duas camisas who ‘subordinate themselves to parallel commands’ and ‘enclose themselves in the proposal of a traditional vanguardist party that deems itself representative of the working class’.

Ribeiro (2010) thus summarizes that PT leaders created the Articulação in order to ‘maintain hegemony’ over the leftist factions in particular: ‘The construction of a large faction [the Articulação] was the measure found to attempt to restrain the activity of the leftist groups’ (186, 187). Along similar lines, Secco (2011) observes that the Articulação arose more as an antitendência’, ‘an effort to contain (enquadrar) the tendências and centralize the party’ (Secco 2011: 123).

The Articulação quickly established a dominant internal position. In the Articulação’s first internal election in 1984, bloc members won two thirds of the delegate seats to the third National Encontro in 1984. From 1984 to 1986, ‘the Articulação began to impose on the entire party its critiques of the other tendências’ behavior’ (Ribeiro 2010: 188).

228 Interestingly, the Articulação’s first major imposition targeted the more elitist, institutionalist sectors of other things, Articulação leaders insisted on a more inclusive and less strident campaign for the 1985 mayoral elections. Keck (1992: 155) thus observes that in 1985, the PT adopted a more inclusive and humorous campaign tone and even made better use of media in certain elections (e.g., the São Paulo mayoral race). The party ran more middle-sector candidates and paid more attention to the middle sectors and other demographics (e.g., housewives) (155).

After the PT’s unexpectedly strong performance in the 1985 elections, the Articulação consolidated its dominance. Basking in the glow of the PT’s strong electoral results, Articulação wrested or retained control of the vast majority of zonal, municipal, and state Diretórios and increased its dominance within the Diretório Nacional, having elected nearly three quarters of the delegates at the IV Encontro Nacional.

Executive proportionality and dupla militância

As the Articulação consolidated its dominance, tensions between PT moderates and radicals escalated. The creation and consolidation of the Articulação both exacerbated and brought into relief the internal marginalization of the Marxists. Radicals began to chafe at the rules of the petista political system, which patently benefited moderates at the expense of radicals. As described earlier, PT formally practiced winner-takes-all majoritarianism in the allotment of executive posts at all levels. With majorities in Diretórios at the federal, state, municipal, and zonal levels, the Articulação, after 1984 and 1986 Encontros, monopolized the PT’s executive functions, except where subnational Executivas informally practiced the party. In 1985, the PT membership internally voted in favor of boycotting the indirect elections. The ‘no’ vote prevailed, in part, because the left tendências most opposed to the indirect elections mobilized their members effectively. Following the vote, the PT’s national Diretório, controlled by the Articulação, mandated that all federal deputies abstain. When three (of sixteen) PT federal deputies – Airton Soares (SP), Bete Mendes (SP), José Eudes Freitas (RJ) – participated and cast votes for the PMDB’s Tancredo Neves, the DN promptly expelled them from the party.

Absent the formal implementation of proportionality in the CEN, the Articulação would monopolize the PT’s most important executive body indefinitely. The majoritarian system for the Executivas ‘was one of the main bones of contention between the Articulação and the leftist factions throughout the 1980s’ (Ribeiro 2010: 188). By the May 1986 Encontro, the PT’s left tendências feared irrelevance and, increasingly, began to openly question whether they should remain in the PT.

For the Articulação, unity of action remained at the top of the internal agenda. Despite internal differences, the PT needed to project an image of unity and a coherent message. PT radicals, in the view of Articulação leaders, continued to undermine this imperative. Moderate exasperation with left tendências’ entreismo (‘betweenism’) and abuse of the Direito de Tendência (factional rights) intensified around the time of the IV Encontro Nacional (May 1986). Only a month earlier, in April, authorities had arrested a group of radical petistas for robbing a Banco do Brasil branch in Salvador (Ribeiro 2010: 188). At the Encontro, the PT expelled the implicated petistas and formally resolved to regulate (regulamentar) and contain (enquadrar) the tendências in the next Encontro Nacional. ‘The question of proportionality [in the Executivas] could only be discussed after that enquadramento. In the meantime, the majoritarian criterion would remain in effect’ (Ribeiro 2010: 188). In May of 1987, O Trabalho, one of the PT’s most important Trotskyist factions, split in two, with most joining the Articulação and the rest remaining a separate tendência (called the Agrupamento).

Throughout 1987, left petistas forcefully demanded proportional representation in the CEN, calling the majoritarian alternative nakedly anti-democratic. In an April 1987 pamphlet, 229

petista Augusto de Franco wrote: ‘Mere obedience of statutes by individuals...and identification with the platform are not sufficient to normalize democratic relations between the diverse tendências within the PT and between the tendências and party organs’. Granted, ‘everyone must endorse the majority position after internal deliberations...so that for the masses, there [is] only the PT, and not its currents’. Yet the PT’s internal political system must enable the various tendências ‘to defend their stances within the party’. The pamphlet centered on the need for proportional representation ‘in all party organs: Diretórios and Executivas’. Later, the pamphlet reiterated ‘the necessity of correcting deformities in our internal democracy (guaranteeing, for example, proportional participation of the minorities in the Executivas)’. In a June 1987 pamphlet, ‘Sobre a construção partidária’ (‘On party-building’), Marxist PT leader Raul Pont extolled proportional representation in the Diretórios but stressed: ‘We need to consecrate that at the level of the Executivas as well, incorporating...this rule explicitly and clearly so that it does not depend on the good will of the...majorities’.

In December 1987, the PT held its fifth Encontro Nacional, standardly considered ‘the most important in the history of the PT’ (Secco 2011: 121). The Articulação won sixty percent of the delegate vote – a wide majority, but not as wide as in 1986. At the Encontro, left tendências, for the first time, formally proposed the implementation of proportionality in the CEN. The Articulação, despite some defections, succeeded in blocking the motion. In a formal resolution on the issue, the Articulação acknowledged that, at the subnational level, PT Diretórios already practiced proportionality on an informal basis but cited the need for greater cohesion at the top. The Articulação resolved that the National Diretório would only approve proportionality in the CEN if radical tendências first consented to the abolition of dupla militância. The resolution affirmed that all PT tendências must treat the PT as a strategic vehicle, not as a tactical front in the service of separate, fundamental objectives. Handing over executive functions to tendências with separate party projects, the resolution argued, would prevent unified action and lead to decision-making paralysis.

The general resolution passed, but due to internal negotiations with the the most ‘problematic’ tendências as well as the demands of the 1989 presidential campaign, the PT did not regulate the tendências or institute proportionality across the board until 1990 (Ribeiro 2010: 189). In April 1990, the DN abolished the right of tendências to claim independent status as ‘parties’, subordinate members to internal decisions, subordinate themselves to international bodies, engage in clandestine activities, disseminate independent programs, man independent locales, and more (Ribeiro 2010: 189). In May of 1990, the DN instituted proportionality for executive committees at all levels, including the CEN. At its first National Congress in 1991, the PT lowered barriers to entry for representation in the Diretórios – and hence the Executivas – by abolishing the ten-percent minimum. In addition, the PT took several measures to empower base-level petistas without strong ties to a particular tendência, and hence to limit the decision-making influence of small, well-organized left tendências (e.g., the institution of a direct method – i.e., closed primaries – for executive candidate selection).

The implementation of proportionality in the CEN observably strengthened left tendências’ commitment to the PT. The vast majority of left tendências accepted the internal regulatory reforms of 1990-1 period. Some of these, including the PRC and PCBR, dissolved and either joined preexisting tendências or created new ones. Others continued as before, but in deference to the new regulations (Ribeiro 2010: 192-3). As of mid-1990, PT tendências numbered ten in total: the Articulação and nine smaller Marxist tendências. In 1992, the PT expelled two Trotskyist tendências, Convergência Socialista and Causa Operária, for violating the newly imposed restrictions on tendências.

The Marxist surge
and risk of schism

The collapse of socialist regimes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Bloc produced a realignment of forces within the PT. First, the crisis of international socialism led some Marxist factions to ‘renovate’. The PRC, a Marxist tendência with ‘reasonable internal weight’ led by José Genoino, renounced Marxism at the VII Encontro in 1990 and moved definitively to the PT’s right wing, alongside the more moderate sectors of Articulação. More importantly, the collapse of socialism created a fissure within Articulação that ultimately led to the group’s schism. Whereas Articulação’s moderate majority saw the collapse of the USSR and Eastern European regimes in a positive light, ‘the Marxist and ex-Marxist wings’ of Articulação, like the PT’s left tendências, ‘refused to expressly condemn the socialist experiments that were collapsing’ (Ribeiro 2010: 197). The left dissidents within Articulação claimed that the bloc’s moderate wings, in pursuit of electoral success, were abandoning the PT’s commitment to socialism and, in their excessive focus on institutional politics, distancing the party from civil society, its historical source of strength (Melo 1994: 86-9; Ribeiro 2010: 199-200, 203).

Articulação held a majority at the VII Encontro, and the formal resolution approved at the Encontro, entitled O Socialismo petista, reflected the tendência’s ideological divisions. In keeping with tradition, the text affirmed socialism and ‘firmly’ rejected social democracy, both as an end in itself and a means to socialism (Ribeiro 2010: 199). The resolution shied away from a specific, positive vision, Marxist or otherwise. As before, ‘petista socialism would be built from practical experience’ (ibid). Yet in a demonstration of left dissidents’ influence, the text also warned of a ‘capitalist regression’ in the Eastern Bloc countries (ibid).

Equally, the resolution reflected efforts by Articulação’s moderate leaders (e.g., Lula, Dirceu) to bridge the tendência’s growing divide. The text’s formulators endeavored, when possible, either to synthesize or navigate between the tendência’s contrasting, even contradictory, left and right wings. They resolved, for example, that the PT should both lead (ser dirigentes de) and dialogue with (ter interlocução com) civil society, not one or the other.

By the time of the PT’s polarized I Congresso (1991), however, conflict between moderates and radicals had become ‘significantly sharper’ (Ribeiro 2010: 197), and internal conflict had begun to hamper the Articulação’s internal electoral fortunes. Articulação elected a plurality, but not a majority, of delegates to the congress. Over the next two years, conjunctural debates – regarding Collor’s impeachment, the presidentialism/parliamentarism plebiscite, and Luiza Erundina’s controversial term in São Paulo – further divided Articulação (Ribeiro 2010: 200-3). Meanwhile, external critiques of Articulação from the PT’s Marxist tendência were resonating with and galvanizing large segments of the party base. In 1992 and 1993, Marxist tendência won majorities in a series of major municipal Diretórios, including those of São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Salvador, Fortaleza, Porto Alegre, Vitória, and Belém (Hunter 2010: 120, note 18). These municipal results affected the composition of state Diretórios, which in turn would affect the composition of the Diretório Nacional.

The ‘core of the Articulação’, under the new name Unidade de Luta (Hunter 2010: 125, note 33), published a separate, individual tese, as did Democracia Radical (‘definitively situated on the PT’s right wing’ (Ribeiro 2010: 204)) and a coalition of the PT’s most extreme left tendências.

The HV/DS tese won majority support (fifty-six percent), giving PT radicals their first national majority. The text approved at the VIII Encontro Nacional unambiguously endorsed socialism, embraced revolutionary struggle, and rejected the ‘third way’ between socialism and social democracy. The text also exhorted a second ‘return to the base’. Months after the Encontro, the Articulação’s left dissidents would register as a formal tendência under the name Articulação de Esquerda (AE).

The PT’s official platform and preliminary campaign strategies for the 1994 presidential election reflected the internal ascendance of the Marxist tendências. The platform ‘evoked radical change brought about by state action’, promising transformation and even revolution. With regard to campaign strategy, left tendências insisted on highlighting Lula’s status as an operário (laborer) and on allying exclusively with left-wing, predominantly socialist parties such as the PCdoB, the Brazilian Socialist Party (PSB), the United Socialist Workers’ Party (PSTU), the Popular Socialist Party, and the Green Party (PV).

The platform did depart however, from the strident, unabashed socialism of 1989, demonstrating the evolution and continued influence of the moderate minority.

As the 1994 election neared, moderate/radical tensions escalated. In some respects, these 235 Prior to 1986, the DS had been an independent party as well as a powerful left tendência in the PT. In 1986, the DS dissolved and became a PT tendência only. In subsequent years, the DS tacked toward the ‘center’ of the PT political system, becoming part of the PT’s ‘moderate left’ (Ribeiro 2010: 204).

238 Hunter (2010) summarizes, ‘[t]he overarching difference between the 1989 and 1994 programs was that the latter backed away from professing socialism as the ultimate goal’ (118-9).
tensions mirrored, at the national level, internal PT struggles that had previously occurred at the subnational level. Indeed, since the mid-1980s, the most intense conflicts within the PT had occurred when PT executive candidates and elected PT executives, confronted with the realities of campaigning and governing on a large scale, sought to impose pragmatic measures and confronted resistance from internal PT elements. The first major episodes occurred in large municipalities, including Fortaleza (1986-9), Campinas (1989-92) and São Paulo (1989-92). In São Paulo, prefeita Luiza Erundina (PT) had sought unsuccessfully to sell a pragmatic, pluralistic governing approach, the ‘PT de resultados’, on the local and national PT. Erundina’s struggles with the PT organization had continued without resolution for four years, hampered her administration, and played a significant role in the PT’s defeat in São Paulo in 1992 (Hunter 2010: 89-92).

Ironically, in the lead-up to the 1994 presidential election, Lula and his closest associates (e.g., José Dirceu), who had weighed in against Erundina just a couple of years earlier, ‘began to fear for the PT’s chances in the upcoming presidential election’ and moved to impose a more pragmatic campaigning strategy and more moderate platform on the Marxist-controlled Diretório Nacional. Importantly, however, what Luiza Erundina failed to achieve in São Paulo, Lula succeeded in achieving nationally. After the formation of the ‘extreme left’ Diretório Nacional in 1993 (Hunter 2010: 121), Lula ran for party president and won overwhelmingly. Lula used his mandate to inject a dose of pragmatism into the party’s

239 In February 1991, new unionist Jacó Bittar, petista mayor of Campinas, was expelled from party after ‘developing strong links with the [clientelistic] Quercia machine’ and stating that he was ‘no longer bound by decisions of the Campinas diretório’ (Keck 1992: 235).

240 The Erundina administration favored social policies that would benefit all disadvantaged sectors of society, including the vast informal poor, and not just PT constituents (e.g., formal-sector workers). The municipal and national PT and CUT forcefully resisted, demanding the union-focused agenda that Erundina promised in the campaign. Erundina also awarded all major cabinet positions to allied factions, alienating important sectors of the São Paulo Diretório (Hunter 2010: 91).

241 Secco (2011) writes that the PT was ‘its own greatest enemy’ during Erundina’s term (1989-92) (130).

1994 presidential bid. Shortly after winning, in late May of 1993, Lula demanded that the PT’s xiitas (Shiites, or radicals) ‘give him a margin of autonomy to run his campaign’ and ‘threatened to call off his candidacy if the trend toward radicalization continued’ (Hunter 2010: 121). Subsequently, Lula met ‘quietly’ with business elites, contacted centrist party leaders ‘about possible alliances’, insisted on moderating the PT’s privatization and expropriation platforms, and successfully advocated the vice presidential nomination of business- and military-linked Aloizio Mercadante (Hunter 2010: 121-2). Lula managed to impose these measures without incident.243

Despite his efforts, Lula lost decisively to the PSDB’s Fernando Henrique Cardoso (FHC). Save the PT’s 1982 electoral debacle, this loss proved the most devastating and challenging in the party’s history. With good reason, petistas had entered the campaign confident of victory and, on the prevailing internal analysis, lost unnecessarily. FHC had played a leading role in devising and promoting the anti-inflationary Real Plan as finance minister. The Real Plan enjoyed immense public support, having stabilizing Brazilian price levels after years of high inflation and periodic hyperinflation. Imprudently, moderates and radicals alike had chosen to oppose the Plano Real. While Hora de Verdade and other left tendências had ‘publicly demeaned price stability as a ‘bourgeois’ concern’, moderate factions [had] charged that stabilization had been accomplished by squeezing salaries, and members of the Lula camp [had] openly predicted the ultimate failure of the plan’ (Hunter 2010: 125).

Lula’s pragmatism notwithstanding, PT moderates also believed that the party’s continued association with leftism, in voters’ minds, had contributed to the 1994 presidential loss. Moving forward, they concluded, the party would not win national power on an uncompromising left platform. This conclusion marked an important shift. Prior to the 1994 election, many 243 On Hunter’s (2010) summary, ‘[a]s radical as the program, tone, and tactics [alliances, caravans] of the 1994 campaign were, without the moderating influence of Lula and his associates they would have been markedly more so’ (Hunter 2010: 120).

PT moderates believed that a solidly left party could win national power in Brazil. This view stemmed, in large measure, from Lula’s strong performance in 1989. PT moderates and radicals alike originally took Lula’s 1989 performance as evidence that left-wing appeals resonated with the median voter in Brazil.

After 1994, a revisionist view of the 1989 election took hold among PT moderates. Leftism as such had not benefited Lula. Instead, the ‘special circumstances of [the 1989] campaign – a highly polarized contest between a populist right-wing candidate associated with the military regime and a candidate who represented a break with that style and era’ – accounted for Lula’s strong showing (Hunter 2010: 126).

After Lula’s 1994 loss, PT moderates concluded that future presidential victory would require ‘a centrist ideological shift’, ‘the provision of concrete immediate material benefits’, a deemphasis on program, and an increased emphasis on Lula’s charismatic personality (Hunter 2010: 126). Moderates thus stepped up their efforts to defeat radicals internally. The PT’s X Encontro Nacional, the most polarized in the PT’s history, took place in 1995. The Articulação, in alliance with the DR, narrowly won after ‘picking off’, with offers of top party positions, two AE elites who had played important roles in the AE’s creation (Cândido Vaccarezza, Rui Falcão).

The contest for party president pitted José Dirceu of Articulação, whom Lula explicitly supported, against Hamilton Pereira of AE. During pre-vote speeches, César Benjamin of the AE made an ‘unusual frontal attack’ on Dirceu, to Dirceu’s surprise. On Hamilton Pereira’s telling, Benjamin emphasized that Dirceu ‘had received money from businesspeople, and ‘that it was absurd for a workers’ party to rely on money from big business... In sum, he said everything that his liver dictated’. Dirceu edged out Pereira by two to three percentage points, and PT centrists once again assumed control of the DN and CEN.

In a vivid demonstration of the party’s deep fissures, however, the PT did not manage to form the full CEN until January of 1997, due to an impasse resulting from the Articulação’s refusal to give the Secretary General position to AE member, Arlindo Chinaglia. As initially promised, Cândido Vaccarezza received the appointment in exchange for having defected from AE prior to the X Encontro.

The 1996 municipal elections did not alleviate internal tensions. After the elections, an anonymous moderate petista in the CEN raised the ire of radical petistas, arguing – in agreement with a recent Estado de São Paulo article – that moderates had fared better than radicals, and that the PT would benefit from left tendência’s ‘domestication’ and maturation.

Reflecting on the X Encontro and resulting impasse in forming the CEN, Hamilton Pereira recalled years later: ‘See the point we reached in terms of fragility...’

Lacerda (2002: 66-9) and Ribeiro (2010: 207-8) concur that, at this moment, the PT came as close as ever to a major schism.

Yet internal crisis gave way, relatively quickly, to moderate hegemony. After their 1995 victory, the Articulação and DR formalized their alliance under the new name, Campo Majoritário and set out to institutionalize moderate control of the PT, which in the previous couple of years seemed to have depended on Lula’s informal, ‘behind-the-scenes’ machinations. Campo Majoritário would remain the PT’s dominant coalition into the 2000s and

248 Despite an organizational format of low leadership autonomy, Lula found ways to exert authority over the party and to assume independent or parallel actions when he could not do so. Nonetheless, it was evident to party moderates that they could not always depend on such informal measures. After the 1994 transform the PT into a center-left, electoral-professional, and (according to Ribeiro 2010) internally undemocratic party.

The fundamental sources of PT unity

Though beset by internal conflict from inception, the PT, unlike other Brazilian parties (e.g., PDS and PMDB) and other Latin American new left parties (e.g., IU, LCR, FMLN), never suffered a major schism. What factors, fundamentally, enabled the PT to avoid debilitating schism?

Petista socialism and internal democracy?

Many party members and observers have pointed to the party’s undefined socialism and participatory democracy. While the former made the PT’s ideology contestable, the latter gave members and factions a fair chance at influencing the evolution of this ideology. On the importance of ideological indefiniteness for cohesion, Ribeiro (2010) writes that

> ‘The maintenance (and even exaltation) of this ideological indefiniteness (nebulosidade), over the years, became an incentive for tendências to remain in the PT. The petista ideology was seen as terrain in dispute (campo em disputa) by the factions, each with its more consolidated theory. A more precise ideological definition would be an incentive to defect for disagreeing correntes’ (Ribeiro 2010: 214).

Along similar lines, Marxist petista Hamilton Pereira, in reference to the texts approved at the I Congress (1991), opined that > ‘socialismo petista...[was] a lucid, intelligent formulation because it [didn’t] opt for a conceptual or ideological definition of socialism, but suggest[ed] a path to follow in order to get a formulation. That was a political accomplishment of the greatest importance... [The PT] ‘managed, presidential defeat they would take steps toward developing more institutionalized means to secure their leadership position within the organization’ (Hunter 2010: 123).

249 Some might regard the 2004 schism, in which Marina da Silva defected from the PT to form PSOL. PSOL, however, quickly became a marginal force, and the PT won the next two presidential elections. In contrast, the offshoots of the FDS and PMDB – the PFL and PSDB – became institutionalized and, on most accounts, surpassed their predecessors.
in the thick (miolo) of the crisis of socialism’s demoralization, to find a formula that [gave] ideological cohesion to the party.250

Some of the same scholars (e.g., Ribeiro 2010), as well as numerous petistas, have also suggested that the PT’s much vaunted internal democracy, by giving factions a ‘fair shot’ at shaping the party’s explicitly open-ended future, helped the PT avoid debilitating schisms.
Internally, the PT constituted a forum in which a wide range of individuals and groups could dialogue, debate, and vie for influence over the party’s direction. Tendências competed in elections at the zonal, municipal, state, and national levels, and the party eventually allocated executive functions, at all levels, through proportional representation. Scholars and petistas claim that this internal regime fostered a sense of inclusion and agency among participating petistas. In particular, scholars and party members have identified the implementation of full proportionality in the CEN as decisive for avoiding major radical defections during the second half of the 1980s (e.g., Ribeiro 2010).

The ill-defined, open-ended nature of petista socialism did indeed allow for internal ideological contestation, and there is ‘no question that the degree of internal democracy and level of participation in PT far outstrip[ped] that of any other important Brazilian party’ (Keck 1992: 121).251 Yet the exogenous contribution of these variables (ideological indefiniton, internal democracy) to PT cohesion should not be overstated. While a more specific party ideology might have alienated important sectors within the PT, petista socialism possessed far too little positive content to fuel the PT’s heterogeneous base, absent other factors.

Internal democracy-centered explanations of PT cohesion overlook a number of key counter-arguments. First, the PT only implemented proportional representation at the national executive level in 1990, a full decade after the party formed. Until 1990, thus, PT mod-

250 Interview with Hamilton Pereira in de Moraes and Fortes (eds., 2008: 270).

251, and that ‘the PT has initiated into political life thousands of cadre who feel confident about publicly defending party positions’ erates monopolized the party’s executive functions at the national level, ‘dominat[ing] the strategic posts’ (Ribeiro 2010: 211). Second, although proportional representation in the national executive kept radical factions in the PT, the defection of radical factions, in all likelihood, would not have seriously weakened the party. The PT would have retained its core leadership, including Lula, and the party brand would have remained intact.

Third and finally, internal democracy arguments focus on institutional design but do not account for institutional strength. Comparative evidence suggests that, with respect to internal procedures for adjudicating conflict, the particularities of institutional design matter relatively little. In order for internal institutions to act as a source of cohesion, all major players must ‘buy in’. From the PT’s inception, the tendências, by and large, accepted internal election results and complied with internal decisions made by opponents in power. This requires explanation. In other important parties and coalitions, factions have refused to submit to the dictates of internal opponents. In Peru’s Izquierda Unida (IU), for example, every constituent party reserved veto power in the party cúpula (see Chapter Five). In Mexico’s PRD, accusations of fraud continue to mar internal elections between party corrientes (see Chapter 3). The strength of the PT’s democratic institutions simply raises the question:
Under what conditions do ideologically heterogeneous politicians and activists internalize the ethos of opposition loyalty expressed in such petista statements as:

‘I’ve always held that the tendências are important, but they cannot be more important than the party organs. Thus, any position taken by the tendências regarding governance must pass through the party organs... [R]espect for pluralism and internal diversity is a sacred thing for us’. – Olívio Dutra

In Mexico’s PRD, most internal compromise and conflict adjudication occurred through through the office of party leader, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas. Although the PRD possessed an internally democratic formal structure based on local, state, and federal elections and proportional representation, the party’s parallel, informal hub-and-spokes regime, based on Cárdenas’s active brokerage of competing demands, accounted for virtually all major decisions. Chapter 3 presents this argument in depth.

‘We learned democratic practice...with the factions inside the PT. [The factions] helped a lot in building and consolidation the PT. Did we disagree? We disagreed. Are we going to argue? Let’s argue. Are we going to resolve our differences? We're going to resolve them. Are we going to come up with a plan of action? We are. This was always respected, and it was very good for the PT.’ – Djalma Bom

The great virtues of the PT organization were its internal democracy, its openness, without rigidity, non-sectarian, non-dogmatic, accepting of currents within it that came from the Church, currents of every type, that wanted to fight against the dictatorship. These are the things that make the PT unique.... But we’ll never cease to have a nucleus, a current that thinks more about the future, that thinks what the party doesn’t think...’ – Raul Pont

If not ideological indefiniteness or internal democracy, what factors fundamentally account for the early PT’s cohesion?

Lula’s indispensability: electoral coattails and internal legitimacy

For PT radicals, the prospect of winning national power – of defeating the ‘bourgeois state’ – provided a strong electoral incentive to remain in the PT, and thus helped compensate for ideological differences with moderate petistas. In a June 1987 internal text, ‘On party-building’, Marxist petista Raul Pont wrote,

‘If the PT’s organs of debate and deliberation are democratic, and factional rights are assured, it is imperative that once [internal] decisions are made, the party acts cohesive and unified. This unity is not dictated by some desire of ours or the whim of more orthodox spirits. It is dictated by the unity and strength of our enemy. The bourgeois state, through monopolies, the police, the armed forces, and the media, is increasingly unified in its repressive actions, in its capacity to act.’

Yet for petistas, the possibility of winning national power, during the formative phase, did not come primarily from the PT brand. It came primarily from Lula’s membership in the party. Like most new parties, the PT did not possess a powerful, solid brand upon creation.

The party won less than three percent of the Chamber vote in 1982, roughly five percent in 1986, and a little over ten percent in 1990. Especially given the electoral clout of the ideologically proximate PMDB, the PT label provided a relatively weak electoral incentive against elite defection.

To a significant degree, thus, the ‘Lula brand’ substituted for a strong PT brand during the formative phase. From the beginning, early petistas coordinated, in large measure, around the goals of electing Lula governor of São Paulo (in 1982) and, subsequently, president of the Republic (in 1989 and 1994). On this point, party members and observers leave little room for doubt. Marxist petista Hamilton Pereira summarized that ‘the PT confronted enormous difficulties to become consolidated as a political pact in the 1980s... The PT achieved an elevated padrão of discipline and unity of action. In large part generated by the expectation to elect Lula president, it’s true’. 257 ‘All PT candidates’, Lincoln Secco summarized in an interview, ‘depended on Lula’s electoral performance’, which ‘pulled along’ lower-level PT candidates 258 Pedro Ribeiro observed in conversation that ‘everyone knew [Lula] was the name with the greatest electoral appeal in the PT’ 259 Keck (1992) observes, ‘...[I]t was recognized that the party had to include Lula to get off the ground (Keck 1992: 81). Hunter (2010) argues that ‘[t]he PT benefited from having a single virtually irreplaceable leader who enjoyed more societal support than the party’ (3). In short, because Lula enjoyed greater external popularity than the PT, his presence provided a strong electoral incentive for petistas to remain within the party fold.

Crucially, however, it was the risk of internal radical takeover, not the threat of radical defection, that produced the early PT’s most significant internal crises. After both the 1982 electoral debacle and, years later, the left tendências’ surge in the mid-1990s, Lula and his moderate allies sought, facing possible failure, to impose on the PT’s radical wing. If they had failed, they might have abandoned the PT project as electorally non-viable, like other new left leaders in Latin America under similar circumstances (e.g., Alfonso Barrantes (see Chapter Five)).

In describing Lula’s internal dealings with the PT, many petistas and external analysts highlight the ways in which Lula ‘stood above faction’[260] Although ‘symbolically’ associated with Articulação (Secco 2011: 93) and, more generally, with PT moderates, Lula ‘put himself above the factions in various ways’ and refrained from explicitly ‘taking sides’[261] Lula chose, for example, not to join the Articulação formally. He also demonstrated prudence in abstaining, consistently, from contentious internal votes. In an academic study of the ideological tensions and ambiguities in the PT from 1980 to 1995, de Azevedo (1995) observes that Lula ‘always avoids participating in any faction or involving himself directly with any party bloc’ (154). In an extension of this argument, Marxist petista Hamilton Pereira, in 2008, extolled Lula and his moderate allies for standing above and embracing the PT’s heterogeneous factions, and for defining the PT very clearly, at the outset, as a political rather than ideological pact[262]

Yet these claims should not be overstated. During the internal crises mentioned above, Lula sided with the moderates, and whether he did so explicitly or implicitly, the PT base knew where Lula ‘stood’. PT cohesion thus depended, in large measure, on Lula’s demonstrated ability to ‘tame’, or ‘domesticate’, radical elements of the PT base.

[261]Interview with Secco.
[262]The great merit of our first leaders, Lula, Zé (José) Dirceu, was that they formulated the following vision: ‘We cannot start from the premise that we are an ideological pact. For the PT to work, we have to constitute ourselves as a political pact, that abrique (shelters, protects) these differences. But that perception was not made explicit initially. It will only be made explicit at the V Encontro. It was a kind of instinctive thing: ‘People, don’t make this a religion; that will put us on a bad course (desanda). It can’t become the Church... [The leadership] was a non-group group, a tendência against tendências’ (interview with Hamilton Pereira in de Moraes and Fortes (eds., 2008: 264).
Lula’s internal leverage came, in part, from his aforementioned coattails. In her analysis of PT adaptation in the 1990s, Hunter (2010) demonstrates that Lula, in order to ‘demand change within the party’, ‘used his electability as leverage’ (3). ‘The presence of a popular leader with a singular ability to gain societal support’, she later summarizes, ‘served as crucial leverage for change within the [PT]’ (6).

Lula’s internal leverage, however, did not stem from electoral coattails alone. Comparative evidence suggests that electoral coattails are not sufficient for a moderate party leader to impose pragmatic measures on a radical base, especially if a separate leader within the party commands greater loyalty among the radical base. Unlike other leaders of new left parties in Latin America, Lula combined electoral coattails with remarkably broad-based support within the heterogeneous PT. Perhaps more than any other single event, Lula’s victory by ‘overwhelming consensus’ in the 1993 contest for PT president – despite left tendências’ control of the DN – demonstrated Lula’s unique level of support across the PT base.

Where did this support come from? In contrast to other new left leaders in Latin America (e.g., Alfonso Barrantes), Lula, in his capacity as PT leader, began with strong ties to his party’s core feeder groups, having led and actively participated in the PT’s autonomous labor struggles of origin. By the end of the 1970s, Lula, to a greater degree than any other individual, had developed collaborative relationships with the full range of leaders involved in the autonomous labor movement, from rural, industrial and middle-sector unionists to Catholic leftists and Marxists. As Sluyter-Beltrão (2010) summarizes in his study of the movement’s rise and ‘decline’, the metalworkers of São Bernardo, led by Lula, ‘constituted...the principal hub of the New Unionism’ (Sluyter-Beltrão 2010: 3; emphasis added). Since the early PT grew out of the new unionism, Lula constituted the hub of the early PT network as well.

263By way of illustration, Peru’s IU split apart and collapsed before the 1990 presidential election because party leader Alfonso Barrantes, on whom the IU depended electorally, failed to impose upon the IU’s radical elements and exited the party in order to run on a separate ticket. See Chapter Five.
More fundamentally, however, Lula’s strong ties across the PT base, both before and after the PT’s creation, were rooted in internal legitimacy and, for many, mística. The early PT’s animating narrative – the founding myth that motivated early moderates and radicals – cast the PT as the first authentically popular political expression in Brazil’s history. The PT’s São Paulo nucleus of new union leaders, led by a manual laborer who had lost a finger in a metalworking accident, incarnated this myth. Lula and the São Paulo autênticos made the PT narrative credible.

Ribeiro (2010) summarizes that ‘the paulista nucleus acted...as a symbolic amalgamation, providing the collective incentives fundamental to party-building. In particular, the charismatic figure of Lula, the líder máximo do PT, was the party-building project’s main source of identification and unity’ (251). In a conversation with the author, Ribeiro characterized Lula as ‘the most authoritative historical voice of the party; the incarnation of PT history’.

Unprompted, one petista observed that Lula, ‘became a unifying force’ in the PT ‘because he incarnated the myth’ of the party as an authentic expression of the popular sectors. Along similar lines, Keck (1992) writes that while ‘Lula was not the only leader with national credibility involved in the creation of the PT’, he was the ‘key figure. As the labor leader primarily responsible for sparking the campaigns and strikes that increased the power 264 On several accounts, Lula’s personal warmth also facilitated relationship-building across moderate and radical networks. Manoel de Conceição, founding PT member, leader of the PT de Ação, and leader of the clandestine Maoist PT feeder party, Ação Popular, recalled: ‘All my life I have had a good relationship with Lula. He has always been my friend, my brother’ (interview with Manoel de Conceição in de Moraes and Fortes, eds., 2008: 71). Lincoln Secco summarized that ‘Lula is very sentimental. Despite not supporting the partisan left, he often praised (elogiava) certain people. I remember that he praised Ronald Rocha of the Tendência Marxista (which is no longer in the PT today)... In a country like Brazil, personal relationships mix easily with political relationships, even though they don’t put an end to ideological differences. Some of Lula’s old friends moved to the left [wing] of the party in certain phases of its history’ (interview with Secco).

265 In an interview, Lincoln Secco emphasized this aspect of Lula’s biography in analyzing Lula’s ‘internal charisma’ (interview with Secco).

of the whole Brazilian labor movement, his was the voice needed to give legitimacy to the formation of a party’ (Keck 1992, p. 77).

Lula’s background earned him the admiration of leading radicals (e.g., Florestam Fernandes) and moderates alike. One Marxist ex-petista observed that although most Marxists considered Lula and the new unionists insufficiently radical, they admired and respected the PT leadership’s authentic working-class origins. Keck (1992) observes: ‘However much the left might criticize what it called his vacillation, it recognized that Lula was still the authentic working-class leader par excellence, and there would be no Workers’ Party without him’ (81).

Lula did not impose on PT radicals by lording his external appeal, or his control of union resources, over them. The manner of Articulação’s rise illustrates this point. The São Paulo new unionists who led the Articulação did not have significant resources at their disposal. Further, the 1982 electoral debacle had chastened them – above all Lula, who had finished a distant fourth in the São Paulo gubernatorial race. Yet they quickly established internal dominance, formally uniting, allying with a broad range of leaders from the Catholic and Marxist lefts, and, under the Articulação label, winning repeated landslides in internal elections.

At root, the creation of the Articulação, in Keck’s (1992) formulation,

> ‘was an attempt to promote a particular definition of the party’s essence... [Articulação’s] legitimacy derived primarily from its ability to shape a credible vision of the party’s identity. Its centrality reinforced the argument that despite the sectarian divisions...the core or essence of the PT was composed of people who brought to the party a wide range of experiences in popular struggles’ (116).

Without Lula, the ‘working-class leader par excellence’ (Keck 1992: 81) and ultimate symbol of the PT’s original struggles, the Articulação, ‘symbolically led by Lula’ (Secco 2011: 93), 268 Interview with Secco. According to Secco, Lula lost much of his respect in 2002, when he promoted a conservative economic platform and enlisted the campaign services of electioneer, Duda Mendonça (interview with Secco). could not have claimed the party’s moral center. The Articulação’s moral authority followed from the central role that Articulação’s leaders, above all Lula, had played in the popular struggles that gave birth to the PT.

Not only had Lula ‘cut his teeth’ in popular struggles prior to the PT’s creation, he remained committed to the PT’s civil society linkages, both rhetorically and in practice, throughout the formative phase. To begin, Lula continued to build internal linkages after the PT’s creation, regularly visiting local party organs in the early years (Secco 2011: 59) and, throughout the 1980s and 1990s, helping bring new civil society leaders into the PT. When the occasion merited it, Lula also weighed in, publicly, against the PT’s more electoralist and institutionalist currents throughout early development. After a group of victorious PT candidates tempered their rhetoric in the late 1980s, for example, Lula rebuked them, warning of those who only knew ‘the red carpet of parliament’ and had not ‘slugged it out’ (amassar barro) in the slums. In the I Congresso (1991), Lula stressed on repeated occasions that ‘[w]e must not let electoral concerns take over the party’s agenda’

In short, a leader without Lula’s popular mystique, organic connections, and ongoing commitment to the grassroots may not have succeeded in ‘taming’ the PT base, whether in the 1980s, when Lula lent decisive weight to the creation and consolidation of Articulação, or in the mid-1990s, when Lula won the party presidency and helped engineer the PT’s long-term shift to center-left electoral-professionalism.

In summary, Lula acted as a fundamental source, perhaps the fundamental source, of unity in the early PT. Not only did he furnish electoral incentives against defection when the party brand remained relatively weak, he also leveraged his electability and strong crossfractional ties, the latter rooted in moral authority, to balance the PT’s diverse currents and, at crucial junctures, impose moderation on a largely radical base.

Numerous petistas and PT analysts converge in this assessment. When asked why the early PT did not split apart despite internal divisions, Lincoln Secco, stated, unprompted, that the early PT was lucky to possess, in Lula, a leader who combined ‘external and internal charisma’

In an interview with the author, Frei Betto, when asked what united the PT, stated that Lula was always the unifying factor. Betto stressed that even when certain tendências disagreed with Lula, they generally did not speak out publicly against him.

When asked the same question, early petista and current São Paulo vereador, Antônio Donato, stated that the early PT was the most viable electoral vehicle on the left, but also that Lula succeeded in creating a strong center without squashing (esmagar) the minorities.

Pedro Ribeiro, in an email conversation with the author, remarked that ‘Lula was always one of the few ‘glues’ between the factions, above them all, unifying the party... Lula was a great negotiator of agreements, and also a guarantor of those agreements - and not only due to the electoral factor, but because he was the most authoritative historical voice of the party, the incarnation of PT history.

Rodríguez (n.d.) concurs in her comparative study of the PT and Mexico’s PRD, summarizing that Lula, like Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, was a ‘strong [leader]...who centralized the functions of the party voice [and], due to [his] moral quality, established [himself] as [a guarantor] of pacts between groups’ (208).

In her comprehensive study of PT adaptation in the 1990s, Hunter (2010) attributes Lula’s 273 Even when the DN expelled the Trotskyist Convergência Socialista and Causa Operária in 1992, Donato observed, they did so against their own will. By violating the regulamentação de tendência, Donato argued, CS and CO, in effect, chose to leave the party (interview with Donato).

successful imposition on radicals to his combination of external and internal support:

‘[A]s a founding member and longstanding leader within the PT, Lula had the authority to convince a wide range of party militants that he could win presidential office if only they would go along with the measures he advocated for change... His candidacy as party president met with overwhelming internal consensus despite fierce conflicts over other issues. At the end of the day, it was Lula’s popularity among petistas [emphasis not in the original] and the widespread belief that he was the candidate the PT could put forth that brought the party back into his fold’ (36, 122).

Hunter (2010) concludes, more generally, that ‘the existence of a single leader who enjoyed both a strong presence within the party and popularity with the electorate’ distinguishes the successful PT from other failed left parties and coalitions in contemporary Latin America (3; emphases not in the original).

The current chapter, in conjunction with Chapter Five, elaborates a similar argument. Chapter Seven will argue that Peru’s new left coalition, Izquierda Unida (IU), collapsed by schism due, fundamentally, to the internal weakness of moderate coalition leader Alfonso Barrantes. Barrantes’ situation in the IU prior to the 1990 Peruvian presidential election roughly paralleled Lula’s situation in the PT prior to the 1994 Brazilian presidential election. Among IU elites, Barrantes alone stood a chance of winning the presidency, but he did not possess moral authority or organic ties within the coalition. IU radicals had always wavered in their support for him, and in the lead-up to the presidential elections, it appeared likely that Barrantes would lose in a closed primary for the coalition’s presidential nomination. Barrantes demanded the nomination outright, absent a primary, and IU radicals refused. Instead of submitting to radical demands and running in the primary, Barrantes split from the IU to run for president in 1990 on a separate ticket. The IU collapsed shortly thereafter.

In this connection, Hunter (2010) identifies Felipe González as ‘an interesting parallel of someone who drew on his popularity among the electorate and within the party to gain acceptance for measures that encountered strong internal opposition’ (36).

Hunter (2010) concurs with this assessment in a brief conclusion: ‘Barrantes proved unable to persuade elements outside his own wing to follow his lead. Unlike Lula, he could not manage to leverage his popularity into moderating the IU’s platform and image to sustain it as a serious electoral contestant. Whereas Lula was a founding member of the PT and remained at the heart of the party, Barrantes did not enjoy this standing. His independence may have allowed him to ‘stay above the fray’, but it also hindered his efforts to exert influence over parties within the Izquierda Unida. The parties of the far left never fully accepted Barrantes’ leadership. Javier Diez Canseco of the PUM, a key component of the IU’s radical wing, even charged that Barrantes had reduced the IU to ‘an electoral front around a caudillo’ (194).
Chapters Four and Five analyze the survival of Mexico’s Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD). Founded in 1989, the PRD has become Mexico’s leading left party and a perennial contender for national and subnational power. Since the late 1990s, the PRD has won eleven gubernatorial elections in six Mexican states and continuously held the jefatura de gobierno of the Federal District, the second most important elected office in the country. The PRD has elected at least ten percent of Mexico’s federal deputies in every congressional election since 1994 (Figure 1). In 2006, the PRD elected a quarter of Mexico’s federal deputies, and the party’s Andrés Manuel López Obrador came very close to winning the presidency. Given Mexico’s size, economic strength, and geopolitical significance, the PRD is one of the most important new left parties in Latin America.

Despite the PRD’s enduring, national electoral significance, leading scholars have often treated the party as a failure. Greene (2007) emphasizes that left ideologues in the PRD leadership and base have made electorally suboptimal choices and thus prevented the party from winning the presidency.\(^1\) Bruhn (1998) argues that the early PRD did not ‘consolidate’, failing to coordinate its activists, build stable party/interest group relations, and construct a strong ‘ideological identity’ (198).\(^2\) Hilgers (2008) similarly claims that the PRD, by engaging heavily in clientelism, has failed to develop a strong programmatic identity (Hilgers 2008). Rodríguez (n.d.) characterizes the PRD as internally dysfunctional, emphasizing that the PRD, unlike Brazil’s Workers’ Party (PT), has weakly institutionalized factional relations and, in her view, no stable dominant coalition (548).\(^3\)

These chapters do not contest the above accounts or critical accounts provided elsewhere\(^4\) Yet they do begin from a different and insufficiently explored premise: that the PRD, if viewed in broader comparative perspective, is a clear case of new party survival. Despite electoral setbacks and a certain degree of internal dysfunction, the PRD is one of a handful of new left parties in Latin America to become institutionalized and regularly contend for national power.

Why did the PRD succeed in becoming institutionalized as a major national party?

1. One such choice is the nomination of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas as the party’s presidential candidate in 2000.
2. Bruhn argues that Brazil’s Workers’ Party (PT), in contrast, did consolidate.
4. Scholars have argued that the PRD has governed poorly at the subnational level (Borjas 2003; Rodríguez n.d.). Ortega (2010) implicitly treats the PRD as an organizational failure, highlighting the party’s infrastructural weakness in various Mexican states and at the base level more generally (13, 17). Martínez (2005) highlights various forms of dysfunction within the national PRD organization. For additional critiques, see Sánchez (2008, 1999).
Castañeda (1995) has compared Mexico’s 1994 presidential election to a soccer game ‘where the goalposts were of different heights and breadths and where one team included eleven players plus the umpire and the other a mere six or seven players’ (131). One could apply this metaphor to the PRD’s entire formative period.

The PRD grew out of cardenismo, a heterogeneous mass movement to elect Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas president of Mexico in 1988. Cárdenas’s bid for the Mexican presidency constituted an attempt, after nearly a decade of economic and humanitarian crisis, to defeat the authoritarian, hegemonic PRI, reverse Mexico’s neoliberal turn, and restore the authentic revolutionary legacy of social justice and economic nationalism championed by Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas’s father, ex-president General Lázaro Cárdenas. After a presidential campaign marked by extreme resource asymmetries and systematic mass media bias against the left, Carlos Salinas of the ruling PRI defeated Cárdenas in an election widely viewed as fraudulent. In the election’s aftermath, the cardenista movement grew in size and intensity, and from it, the PRD emerged.

During the late 1980s and most of the 1990s, the PRI enjoyed a vast public and private resource advantage over its competitors, especially the PRD. Until the mid-1990s, the PRI monopolized broadcast media and controlled the instruments of fraud and repression. The PRI used all of these resources and tools to keep the PRD, in particular, in the political wilderness. The PRD thus developed without patronage or financial resources, and in a closed, hostile media context. The party could not achieve electoral progress except through extensive volunteer activism. During the initial years of party development, national PRD leaders, acutely aware of their disadvantages, made it a top priority to develop party activist networks in as much of the national territory as possible.
Lacking the resources and institutional capacity to finance or administer large-scale territorial implantation from the top down, the national PRD organization depended on the bottom-up initiative and dispersed human and infrastructural resources of the local leaders, movements, and organizations sympathetic to cardenismo. Just a couple of years into the PRD’s existence, thousands of local party nuclei had sprouted up, in various regions of Mexico but especially the Federal District and poor southern states. Most local party organizers had origins in extraparliamentary social left movements and organizations, defecting PRI networks, and the traditional Marxist political left. To build local party branches, these local organizers recruited activists and used physical locales and administrative resources from their feeder structures of origin. The PRD’s bottom-up, decentralized organizational expansion quickly resulted in a high degree territorial implantation. By the middle of the 1990s, the PRD claimed over one-million members and formal offices in over half of Mexico’s 2000-plus municipalities.

The PRD activists who made up the core of the party organization possessed high levels of commitment. Early adversity selected for these committed activists. Due to mass media hostility, fraud, and acute penury and resource asymmetry, party elites could not offer salaries to activists, or make credible promises of national electoral success and patronage spoils in the short term. Moreover, repression and murder at the hands of subnational PRI authorities raised the cost of activism in the PRD’s southern strongholds. Between 1988 and the mid-1990s, hundreds of FDN and PRD activists lost their lives, and thousands spent time in jail. Given these conditions, pragmatists and careerists were unlikely to join the PRD. Only ‘believers’, or individuals with sincere ideological commitments to the party, would participate in such a poorly resourced, electorally uncertain, and personally risky political undertaking.\(^5\)

Electoral disadvantage and repression selected for but did not generate committed PRD activists. The polarization of the late 1980s produced the higher causes that fueled the PRD’s early volunteer army. The goal of taking the reins of national government from the PRI, and dealing a decisive blow to authoritarianism and neoliberalism in the process, spurred local leaders and organizations from across the left ideological spectrum to join in building and campaigning for Cárdenas and the early PRD. Activist commitment solidified when the PRI, in order to retain power, violently repressed and systematically defrauded the left at the national and subnational levels. Early perredistas derived moral and psychological benefits from their active contribution to the party: benefits that compensated for unremunerated time and labor and, in some cases, the threat of violence and even murder.

In sum, within a few years of its creation, the PRD possessed a strong and durable organization, with official party branches in large swaths of the national territory, and with activists driven by a belief in the PRD’s cause, not by a short-term material or electoral payoff. Organizational reach and activist commitment fortified the early PRD amid successive electoral crises. After both the disastrous 1991 midterms and Cárdenas’s unexpectedly lopsided loss in the 1994 presidential election, party activist networks rebounded in territorial bastions.

Setting the stage: PRI decline and the creation of the PRD

Public support for Mexico’s dominant PRI fell precipitously in the 1980s. Latin America’s 1980s debt crisis devastated Mexico, ushering in nearly a decade of economic crisis. Mexico’s per capita income decreased for four of the years between 1982 and 1987, including by nearly six percent in 1986. Inflation increased at an average rate of 88.4 percent per year between 1982 and 1988, reaching 159 percent in 1987. The real minimum wage fell by roughly half between 1983 and 1988. The ranks of unemployed swelled over the course of the decade, as Like most Latin American governments, the administration of Miguel de la Madrid (PRI) reacted to the 1980s debt crisis by shifting from economic statism and protectionism to austerity and free market reforms. In the initial years of de la Madrid’s sexenio (1982-1988), the PRI government implemented a series of fiscal and market reforms including tariff reductions, large privatizations, broad wage freezes, and draconian budget cuts. The short-term social costs of recession, inflation, and fiscal tightening proved immense. As the decade closed, middle- and lower-class Mexicans had fewer jobs, lower incomes, and fewer public benefits to compensate for unemployment or reduced income.

Separate, simultaneous developments caused further reductions in PRI support. The PRI’s core rural constituencies continued to shrink with urbanization. Highly publicized corruption scandals fed popular discontent, particularly given the economic circumstances of the 1980s. Crucially, in 1985, the Federal District suffered a devastating earthquake, which destroyed parts of the city and killed over 10,000 individuals, predominantly from the lower class. The de la Madrid administration’s earthquake response was widely perceived as incompetent and inadequate.

The combination of unfavorable demographic shifts, prolonged economic crisis, corruption scandals, and humanitarian catastrophe generated the PRI’s most significant crisis of legitimacy since the late 1960s. Between 1983 and 1987, public support for the PRI fell twenty-five percent, largely due to increased disaffection among Mexico’s popular sectors (Bruhn 1998: 119). This shift in public opinion created an electoral opportunity for the PRI’s challengers, particularly those on the left.

7 One PRD founder recalls that the most significant drop in PRI public support among Federal District voters came as a result of the earthquake, creating ‘a space’ for a left electoral alternative (interview with Saucedo).
In 1986, a group of dissident PRI leaders founded an anti-neoliberal faction, the Corriente Democrática (CD). Led by Michoacán governor Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, former PRI president and UN ambassador Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, and former UN ambassador Ifigenia Martínez, the CD proposed to rebuild the PRI’s eroding societal linkages and reverse de la Madrid’s austerity and privatization through debt repudiation, wage hikes, increased protection of domestic industry, and increased state involvement in production. CD elites sought to advance their cause from within by democratizing the PRI. They pressed for more vigorous, wide-ranging programmatic debate and the implementation of formally democratic candidate selection procedures (Rodríguez n.d.: 185-6).

The PRI did not carry through substantive internal democratic reforms, and Cárdenas did not receive consideration as the PRI’s presidential candidate. In October of 1987, Carlos Salinas de Gortari, de la Madrid’s Secretary of Program and Budget and an enthusiastic proponent of de la Madrid’s neoliberal adjustments, was fingerpicked as the PRI’s presidential candidate (Rodríguez n.d.: 186). The CD defected from the PRI in protest of the party’s internal authoritarianism and, programmatically, its technocratic neoliberalism and abandonment of revolutionary goals and ideals.

Less than two weeks later, Cárdenas announced his candidacy on the ticket of the Authentic Party of the Mexican Revolution (PARM), formerly a PRI satellite party, or parastatal. Soon after, two additional parastatals, the Socialist Popular Party and the Socialist Workers’ Party, broke with the PRI and joined the CD and PARM to form the National Democratic Front (FDN). Several parties and organizations promptly joined the FDN, including the 8The ‘parastatals’ were a group of electorally marginal, nominal opposition parties which, prior to the PRD’s formation, had ‘cooperated with the PRI to the point of co-nomining PRI presidential candidates’ (Bruhn 1998: 3). Months before officially backing Cárdenas, the PARM announced that it would no longer support PRI presidential candidates (Rodríguez n.d.: 186).

9PPS, PST. After deciding to back Cárdenas, the Socialist Workers’ Party (PST) changed its name to the PFCRN.
Social Democratic Party, the Revolutionary Socialist Party, the Green Party, Democratic Unity, the Progressive Forces of Mexico, and the National Workers’ and Peasants’ Council. In January of 1988, the FDN officially nominated Cárdenas as its presidential candidate.

Cárdenas possessed a powerful electoral brand, particularly among peasants and urban popular sectors. This brand derived from his unique lineage. As the only son of General Lázaro Cárdenas, Cárdenas symbolically bore, for many Mexicans, the authentic legacy of the Mexican Revolution. General Lázaro Cárdenas had served as a general in the Mexican Revolution and as president of Mexico from 1934 to 1940. As president, he had left a lasting imprint, implementing extensive agrarian reform, making pioneering investments in education, infrastructure, and social insurance, and nationalizing Mexico’s oil industry. PRI presidents before Salinas uniformly recognized ‘the General’ as Mexico’s greatest ever (Borjas 2003: 510).

Early campaign events drew an explicit connection between Cárdenas the son and Cárdenas the father. In the initial months of 1988, the Cárdenas campaign held a series of ‘landmark mobilizations’. One took place in the Comarca Lagunera of Coahuila and Durango, where masses of peasants had benefited from Lázaro Cárdenas’s land reform policies. Another took place in Mexico City’s zócalo, where Cárdenas led a rally to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his father’s nationalization of Mexico’s oil industry.10

While Cárdenas’s last name evoked his father and the Mexican Revolution, his first name, Cuauhtémoc, evoked Mexico’s pre-conquest Aztec history. Cárdenas’s ‘physical traits and grave, austere attitude’ further reinforced ‘the indigenous prototype’ rather than ‘the mestizo or creole one’ (Borjas 2003: 293). Cárdenas thus ‘concentrated many of the symbols of national identity displaced during [Mexico’s] recent history’ (Borjas 2003: 293). Bruhn (1998) observes that ‘no other actual or potential opposition candidate could have drawn upon the legitimacy of these symbols in quite the same way’ (127).

As of the late 1980s, the left opposition could point to the deepening immiseration of Mexico’s urban and rural poor and charge the PRI with a kind of betrayal – the acceptance of an externally imposed economic model at the expense of social justice for Mexicans. As governor of Michoacán (1980-6), Cárdenas had opposed, and to some extent defied, the PRI’s neoliberal shift during the 1980s. Thus, the left opposition could propose, through Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, a return to the revolutionary nationalism practiced in the candidate’s political life and embodied in his very name.\footnote{Summarizing the appeal of cardenismo, one scholar observes that the FDN, unlike the opposition PAN, ‘represented the official ideology of social justice from a group of renegade elites capable of revitalizing revolutionary ideals at a moment when...lower sectors felt abandoned by the state’ Brachet-Márquez (1996: 121, emphasis added).}

Cárdenas’s candidacy generated mass support in various regions of the country. This support came primarily from three broad groups: the cardenista left, the traditional Marxist left, and the social left.\footnote{Hernández (2010: 38) identifies these three groups as the three main vertientes of the PRD.} The cardenista or independent left, the largest of the three groups, included citizens who supported Cárdenas but did not participate actively in separate left parties or organizations. Like Cárdenas, many were PRI defectors and did belong to local networks of fellow ex-pri´ıstas. The traditional Marxist left, alternatively the historical or parliamentary left, encompassed a heterogeneous array of Marxist parties that, in the 1970s and 1980s, had moderated, committed to institutional politics, and sought a gradual transition to democracy through electoral participation and political reform. From the mid-1970s to the late 1980s, parties of the traditional Marxist left had created a succession of electoral alliances that culminated in the 1988 founding of the Mexican Socialist Party (PMS).

Initially, for the first half of 1988, the PMS fielded its own presidential candidate, Heberto Castillo of the constituent Mexican Workers’ Party (PMT). The PMS refused to join the...
FDN on ideological grounds; unlike much of the FDN, the PMS ‘retained the basic ideals of socialism and only begrudgingly accepted the tenets of democracy’ (Greene 2007: 93). Ultimately, however, practical electoral considerations trumped ideological differences. In late May of 1988, the powerful student organization, the University Student Council (CEU), expressed overwhelming support for Cárdenas at a rally in UNAM’s Ciudad Universitaria. Fearing political marginalization, recognizing Cárdenas’s unique potential to put the left in the presidency, and somewhat amenable to Cárdenas’s revolutionary nationalism, the PMS, most of whose members lacked pre-PMS ties to Heberto Castillo, opted to back the FDN in early June of 1988. Castillo thus retired his candidacy in favor of Cárdenas, and the PMS joined the Cárdenas campaign.

Cárdenas’s third base of support, the social or extraparliamentary left, included social movements and organizations that had not previously participated in institutional politics. The bulk of these movements and organizations possessed militant Marxist origins. Following the PRI’s violent crackdown on the left in the late 1960s, many Marxist leaders and activists had not moderated, instead rejecting electoral participation and committing to (sometimes violent) social struggle. A large number of social left groups originated as splinter groups from the moderating Marxist establishment. Other social left organizations, usually less militant, emerged subsequently and focused on more post-materialist issues. The social left thus encompassed a wide array of actors, including ex-guerrilla nuclei, rural unions, popular urban movements, teachers’ unions, radical blue-collar unions, student associations, NGOs, environmental groups, homosexual rights groups, and more.

Despite facing a slew of disadvantages, the FDN mounted the most significant challenge to PRI hegemony since the mass mobilizations of the late 1960s. In the lead-up to the 1988 election, the PRI-controlled Televisa and other mass media outlets defamed and ignored Cárdenas, while subnational PRI authorities employed coercion and occasionally committed murder in order to minimize FDN activism, especially in the FDN strongholds of Michoacán and Guerrero. In order to maintain power, the PRI ultimately had to resort to fraud. Cárdenas lost by a wide margin in the official tally, with a reported thirty-one percent of valid votes to Salinas’s fifty percent. The FDN elected nearly twenty eight percent of the country’s federal deputies and four senators, including Porfirio Muñoz Ledo and Ifigenia Martínez in the Federal District. Immediately, the FDN presented evidence of systematic voting irregularities that had favored the PRI, focusing on the presidential election\(^\text{16}\). Cárdenas rejected the official election results and called, unsuccessfully, for a new, clean election. By refusing to recognize Salinas as the legitimate president of Mexico, Cárdenas strengthened his image as an external, anti-system, opposition force.

The Salinas administration assumed power under a cloud of illegitimacy and moved quickly to legitimate and consolidate its rule (Ortega 2008: 206). Soon after the inauguration, the PRI forged a pact with the conservative PAN, agreeing to recognize all of the party’s future subnational victories in exchange for PAN legislators’ support of PRI economic and social policies. In an attempt to pacify the left opposition, the Salinas administration offered the regency of the Federal District to Cárdenas (Borjas 2003: 245). Although some key FDN figures (e.g., Porfirio Muñoz Ledo) favored such a pact with the Salinas administration, Cárdenas, supported by the bulk of the FDN base, rejected Salinas’s offer and imposed a line of intransigencia: steadfast opposition, sustained confrontation, and refusal to negotiate with the PRI under any circumstances.

\(^{16}\)Official rates of electoral participation in rural areas tended to exceed participation in urban areas. In many municipalities, the total number of votes recorded exceeded the number of registered voters. Results from nearly 25,000 voting booths went unreported (Ortega 2008: 201-2).
In an already polarized country, the PRI’s defamatory, violent, and ultimately fraudulent response to the rise of cardenismo further intensified social polarization and opposition mobilization. In the lead-up to the 1988 election, millions of Mexicans had taken to the streets for Cárdenas, and for the democratic and economic transformation that they believed a Cárdenas victory would signify. In response, the PRI, at the federal and subnational levels, had shown that it would stop at almost nothing to keep Mexico’s left opposition from governing the country. Subnational PRI authorities had murdered left activists, and on the standard view among FDN supporters, the national PRI had encouraged, assisted in, and covered up systematic electoral fraud in order to secure Salinas’s victory. Following the 1988 elections, in which fraud extended to the legislative elections as well, Cárdenas supporters dialed up their use of mass mobilization, carrying out mass marches, rallies, and public sit-ins, disrupting long segments of highway, and occupying city halls and government offices in various parts of Mexico. Protests were strongest in Michoacán, where the FDN enjoyed the ‘greatest mobilizing capacity’ (Borjas 2003: 340). The Salinas administration and mass media characterized these actions as intentionally destabilizing (Borjas 2003: 339).

In order to create an institutional channel for this energetic mass movement, Cárdenas and the top FDN leadership, in late October of 1988, proposed the creation of a new left political party. Cárdenas appealed to the millions of Mexicans who had supported his presidential bid, arguing that hastily constructed, poorly organized electoral fronts like the FDN could not effectively wage the post-electoral struggle or, more broadly, generate progressive change in Mexico. Cárdenas’s strong performance in the 1988 election, despite manifold disadvantages, suggested that in the next presidential election, he could win. On the Mexican left, the prospect of a Cárdenas victory – and, with it, a complete transition to democracy and the beginning of a neoliberal reversal – animated individuals and groups of all stripes. The CD and PMS immediately joined. The other constituent parties of the FDN - the parastatals - did not.\textsuperscript{18} In addition to the CD and PMS, millions of independent \textit{cardenistas} and more than twenty civil society organizations and social movements pledged their support.\textsuperscript{19}

The Party of the Democratic Revolution was officially created in May of 1989. To satisfy federal requirements for state assemblies and membership, the PRD adopted the registry of the PMS.\textsuperscript{20} In the broadest terms, the early PRD constituted a left front forged in opposition to an authoritarian, neoliberal ruling party. The party was neither revolutionary nor reformist, but revolutionary nationalist and \textit{cardenista}.\textsuperscript{21} The party’s leader commanded a large external voting base. Internally, the party brought together a cadre of dissident PRI elites (the CD), subnational ex-PRI networks linked to these elites, the bulk of the traditional Marxist left, and the bulk of the social left. These heterogeneous actors united around a vision of democratizing Mexico and reversing the country’s neoliberal turn. More concretely, they sought to win positions of national and subnational power and, in 1994, to deliver Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas to the \textit{Palacio Nacional}.

Low access to media and the state during the PRD’s formative phase

At the time of the PRD’s founding, the PRI controlled the federal government, the governments of the Federal District and all the Mexican states, and the vast majority of Mexico’s municipal governments. The PRD came into existence with no governors and only a handful \textsuperscript{18}In justifying their decision not to join, the PARM cited the proposed party’s links to communism, while the PPS and PFCRN cited the proposed party’s \textit{weak} commitment to socialism. In fact, the parastatals acted in their own short-term political interest, intending to minimize PRI hostility and prevent a loss of seats, or even a loss of party registry, in future elections (Martínez 2005: 58, note 26; Rodríguez n.d.: 248, note 37).

\textsuperscript{19}Martínez (2005: 58); Rodríguez (n.d.: 244).

\textsuperscript{20}In one party leader’s phrase, the PRD was therefore ‘just the continuation of the PMS by another name’ (González 2010: 259). Details on the PMS’s dissolution come later in the chapter.

of mayors in small, poor municipalities. In response to the PRD’s policy of intransigencia (i.e., no negotiation), the Salinas administration adopted a strategy of selective democratization: while opening positions of power to the PAN, national PRI leaders and subnational PRI authorities sought to neutralize the PRD with a range of tactics. These tactics included systematic fraud, repression and murder, lavish campaigns, massive social transfers designed to erode left support, and crucially, the manipulation of mass media coverage. Together, these measures sharply curtailed the PRD’s early electoral success and, consequently, access to state resources. Not until the late 1990s would the PRD begin to gain significant access to media, financial resources, and state power.

(late 1980s to mid-1990s)

During the late 1980s and early 1990s, the PRD suffered repeated fraud at the municipal and state levels. In 1989 and 1990 alone, the PRI stole hundreds of mayoral elections in Mexico state, the southern states of Guerrero, Michoacán, Oaxaca, Puebla, and Veracruz, and additional states such as Baja California, Campeche, Chihuahua, Coahuila, Durango, Hidalgo, and Yucatán. Municipal fraud occurred selectively. The PRI stole elections in larger municipalities but generally accepted PRD victories in smaller municipalities with paltry budgets. Of the PRD’s first 111 mayoral victories, 78 took place in municipalities with fewer than 20,000 inhabitants (Borjas 2003: 363).

During the first half of the 1990s, the most significant instances of anti-PRD fraud occurred at the state level in PRD strongholds. In San Luis Potosí in 1991, Michoacán in 1992, Guerrero in 1993, and Tabasco in 1994, the PRD lost gubernatorial elections under questionable circumstances. In each case, the PRD, often presenting copious evidence, accused the PRI of electoral fraud in addition to voter coercion, illegal levels of spending, and rampant vote-buying. Each of these elections sparked mass protests.

There is evidence that the early PRD suffered limited fraud at the federal level as well. After the 1991 congressional election, in which the PRD fared poorly, party leaders presented evidence of ballot irregularities, rural voter overregistration, and urban voter underregistration (Borjas 2003: 402-3).\(^{23}\) The PRD demanded postponement of the voting, but to no avail. The PRD’s unsuccessful general election in 1994 provoked similar allegations from the party leadership.

In fact, however, the 1991 and 1994 federal elections, while imperfect, were significantly cleaner than the 1988 presidential election (Bruhn 1998: 254). Newspapers El País, The Financial Times, The Guardian, The Times, and Barcelona-based La Vanguardia all reported, for example, that the PRI did not commit large-scale fraud in the 1994 presidential election.\(^{24}\) At the federal level, the PRD’s electoral disappointments and setbacks during early development resulted primarily from factors other than fraud, including repression, stark resource asymmetries, and mass media ostracism and hostility.

\textit{(late 1980s to mid-1990s)}

From the late 1980s to the mid-1990s, subnational PRI authorities violently repressed FDN and PRD activists in select strongholds.\(^{25}\) In the 1988 election’s lead-up and aftermath, thousands of FDN activists were accosted, persecuted, beaten, or jailed, and nearly fifty were killed. After the PRD’s creation, subnational PRI authorities murdered hundreds of \(^{25}\)In fact, Mexico’s PRI regime and its allies committed more political violence against the left, in proportional terms, than the bureaucratic-authoritarian regimes of Brazil (Rodríguez n.d.: 297) and Uruguay.

PRD activists and organized peasants, both to quell specific instances of mass mobilization and to discourage opposition activism more generally. Sources indicate that, by the late 1990s, opponents of the left had murdered between 250 and 600 FDN and PRD activists.\footnote{González et al., eds. (2010: 66); interview with Zambrano in González et al., eds. (2010: 284); Ortega (2008: 208); Bruhn (1998: 202); Borjas (2003: 45, 341, 436); Rodríguez (n.d.: 284); Eisenstadt (1999).} Roughly sixty percent of these murders occurred between 1988 and 1994, the remainder between 1994 and 1996\footnote{Borjas (2003, vol. II): 45.}

The murders were uncoordinated and relatively dispersed, although the majority took place in poor southern states, where Cárdenas and the social left claimed large, active, fiercely loyal, and often radical bases. In these poor regions, homicides rarely resulted in arrest. The largest number of murders occurred in Michoacán, Guerrero, and Oaxaca, respectively.\footnote{Murders in these three states comprised sixty-five percent of the total (Bruhn 1998: 202).} In some instances, the PRI targeted key individuals for killing. Four days before the 1988 presidential election, for example, assailants in the Federal District murdered two of Cárdenas’s top campaign aides, Francisco Xavier Ovando and Román Gil, and left their bodies to be found in an apparent warning to the FDN (Bruhn 1998: 139).

In PRD strongholds, PRI groups also inflicted softer forms of repression, issuing threats, beating protesters, and making arrests on ‘trumped-up charges’ (Greene 2007: 95). Political arrests of left activists numbered in the thousands, perhaps the tens of thousands, between late 1980s and mid-1990s. Because repression was widespread, FDN and early PRD activists often knew victims and, in many cases, carried out party work at considerable personal risk.\footnote{One PRD founder opines that the current generation of young perredistas lack an appreciation of the PRD’s harsh origins: ‘When you tell them how hard it was to build the PRD, facing the PRI government, they don’t understand you because they didn’t live through that period’ (Duarte 2010: 249).}
To a greater extent than repression or fraud, however, an immense resource disadvantage hindered the PRD’s early electoral progress (Greene 2007). The PRD formed outside the state and with very few connections to the economic elite or well-financed organizations. From the beginning, PRD finances ‘fundamentally depended’ on the public party fund, a small pittance until the landmark electoral reforms of 1996 (Borjas 2003: 297). As late as 1994, five years after the PRD’s founding, the national PRD organization could only afford fifty permanent staff (Bruhn 1998: 189). The party chronically suffered from ‘financial shortages’ and a lack of ‘resources to invest in electoral campaigns, infrastructure, and professional cuadros’ (Borjas 2003: 297). Well into the 1990s, PRD candidates had to finance and run their own campaigns, with little or no financial or material support from the party organization.\footnote{In the 1989 state and local elections, for example, the PRD’s National Executive Committee wrote that ‘being a PRD candidate can be a true punishment, given that each one must obtain resources, build a team and organize activities without support or advice of any kind’ (Borjas 2003: 346).}

In contrast, the PRI, during the PRD’s initial years, ‘enjoyed virtually unlimited access to government funds’\footnote{Cornelius (1996): 58.} siphoned off billions of Mexican pesos from the public treasury\footnote{Oppenheimer (1996); Cornelius (2004).} and received billions more from business supporters\footnote{Oppenheimer (1996); Philip (1999); De Swaan, Martorelli, and Molinar Horcasitas (1998).} Throughout the PRD’s formative years, the PRI spent huge sums on electoral campaigns. National and subnational candidates used party funds and private donations to finance traditional campaign events such as rallies and concerts, and also to purchase and distribute clientelistic goods and services, such as free meals and haircuts, on a large scale\footnote{See, for example, Bruhn (1998): 291.} Bruhn (1998) finds that in the 1991 congressional elections, for example, the PRI, unlike the PRD, ran ‘intelligent, ruthless, and lavish campaigns, led by a professional, well-organized, and well-financed staff’ (279-80).
Throughout the first half of the 1990s, the PRI systematically outspent its competitors, especially the PRD, by massive margins. In Michoacán’s 1992 gubernatorial election, for example, the PRI outspent the PRD by a factor of fifty. In 1993, twenty-nine of Mexico’s most prominent businessmen donated 75,000,000 pesos or more to the PRI’s coming presidential campaign; added together, these donations exceeded the budget provided to all political parties by the Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) (Borjas 2003: 426-7). For the 1994 general election, the PRI spent eleven times more than the PRD and PAN combined.

The PRI’s resource advantage went well beyond official campaign spending. Shortly after taking office, Salinas and his ministers implemented the National Solidarity Program, or PRONASOL. PRONASOL allocated federal funds to municipalities for public works, food aid, agricultural credit, land title legalization, and the construction and renovation of schools, hospitals, and transportation infrastructure. A social program of then unprecedented scope in Mexico, PRONASOL, by 1992, accounted for approximately sixty percent of Mexico’s infrastructural spending and approximately half of the country’s social development spending (Bruhn 1998: 219).

PRONASOL was a central component of the PRI’s strategy to win back public support after the cardenista surge and electoral crisis of 1988. The PRI distributed PRONASOL’s vast resources in a timed, targeted, and clientelistic manner, with the specific goal of un-38 PRONASOL resources moved through an extensive patron-client network. Salinas directly appointed state PRONASOL commissioners, who in turn appointed local committees charged with distributing PRONASOL funds for local projects. Local PRI brokers individualized the transfers at the ground level, conditioning the distribution of PRONASOL food baskets, construction materials, and scholarships on electoral support for the PRI (Borjas 2003: 487). The PRI under Salinas also spent millions of dollars on PRONASOL advertisements emphasizing the PRI’s association with the program. PRONASOL packages ‘came painted with Solidarity colors – the same as those of the PRI and the Mexican flag’ (Bruhn 1998: 234).

dermining the PRD. The PRI systematically increased PRONASOL disbursements before elections, especially the 1991 and 1994 federal contests (Magaloni 2006: 149). During the 1994 general election season, PRONASOL transfers amounted to ‘ninety-five percent of the resources spent by all parties’.

The PRI did not disburse PRONASOL funds to PRI or PAN strongholds, so as not to waste electorally valuable resources on secure prístas or on panistas considered unpersuadable (Magaloni 2006: 141). Instead, the PRI leadership sought, through large-scale but surgical social spending, to win the votes of poor Mexicans who had supported Cárdenas in 1988.
Thus, the Salinas administration concentrated PRONASOL outlays in the FDN’s 1988 muunicipal strongholds. In order to ‘undermine opposition party-building’, the PRI made an exception in the FDN bastions where voters, after 1988, had elected a mayor from the PRD or PAN (141, 149). In these municipalities, the PRI, instead of attempting to ‘buy back’ 1988 Cárdenas supporters ‘punished’ them by withholding PRONASOL transfers.

PRONASOL bore electoral fruit for the PRI, at great expense to the PRD. The program’s generous transfers held critical importance for millions of poor individuals and a multitude of underresourced civil society organizations. By 1991, the PRI, through PRONASOL, had managed to co-opt or divide many of the municipal constituencies and civil society organizations previously sympathetic to Cárdenas. Hundreds of municipalities that had supported Cárdenas in 1988 defected to the PRI in 1991 and 1994. Major popular associations that SOL was the only game in town’ (219).

had supported Cárdenas in 1988 fractured or wholly distanced themselves from the PRD in order to receive PRONASOL funds and other targeted PRI transfers.\footnote{A former Asamblea leader and PRD founder recalled, for example, that in Mexico City, the PRI, under the regency of Manuel Camacho, used social transfers to divide the Asamblea (interview with Rascón).}

Numerous scholars, including Molinar and Weldon (1994), Borjas (2003), and Magaloni (2006), have identified PRONASOL as a key determinant of the PRD’s electoral setbacks in 1991 and 1994. Porfirio Muñoz Ledo echoed this assessment at the time. After the 1991 congressional elections, he wrote that through PRONASOL, the PRI had transformed from a ‘party of the state’ – a common characterization for decades – into a ‘party-state’.\footnote{Proceso no. 776, 9/6/1991: 28-32. For similar remarks by Cárdenas, see Proceso no. 773, 8/26/1991: 10-11. Cited by Borjas 2003: 412.} After the 1994 election, Muñoz Ledo, who had been elected party president a year earlier, assessed that the PRD had underestimated government agencies’ ‘capacity for local manipulation through PRONASOL’\footnote{Proceso, no. 931, September 5, 1994, pp. 8-9.}

In the relatively small number of municipalities controlled by the early PRD, perredista mayors typically could not offset PRONASOL and other PRI programs with major projects and social policy initiatives of their own. Municipal governments in Mexico possessed paltry independent budgets and depended to a large degree on federal and state funds (Bruhn 1998: 229, 232).\footnote{In the USA, the federal government, in the mid-1990s, was responsible for less than 60 percent of total public spending, compared to roughly 90 percent in Mexico (Bruhn 1998: 227; Bailey 1994: 105). Due to fiscal centralization in Mexico, Bruhn (1998) writes that ‘...to govern effectively[at the municipal level,] a party must successfully extract resources and cooperation from other state institutions and actors’ (Bruhn 1998: 227).} Early PRD municipal governments received scant resources from the federal government and also, critically\footnote{Magaloni (2006) shows that PAN mayors received more resources in states where the PAN also held the governorship (149).} from state governments, which were under PRI and PAN control. Federal and state governments systematically postponed, rationed, and... sometimes flatly denied various forms of aid (not just PRONASOL resources) to PRD-governed municipalities.\footnote{On postponement and rationing, see Borjas (2003): 468. One party activist stated that PRI governors have ‘always’ denied the PRD resources (interview with C´ortez). Bruhn (1998) summarizes that the Salinas and Zedillo administrations undermined the PRD ‘by controlling the flow of resources and shaping the party’s ability to deliver on promises as a mediator for popular movements, as a local government, and so on’ (Bruhn 1998: 210, emphasis added).}

In summary, the PRI enjoyed access to vast public and private resources during the late 1980s and 1990s. With these resources, the PRI financed lavish campaigns and used targeted social spending to co-opt the left’s natural constituencies. From the late 1980s until the second half of the 1990s, the PRD enjoyed virtually no access to state resources or finance. This resource disadvantage constituted a significant electoral handicap.

The PRD’s low access to media \\
(late 1980s to mid-1990s)

At the time of the PRD’s emergence, most Mexicans depended on television to acquire political information, and even to form political views. Although print media had a significant impact on elite opinion, the vast majority of Mexican citizens did not read newspapers, given the country’s high functional illiteracy rate and weak newspaper circulation.\footnote{Low education levels may also have made Mexican voters more ‘susceptible to media influences than voters in developed democracies like the United States’ (Lawson 2002: 168).} As late as 2002, fewer than fifteen percent of Mexicans drew their news primarily from print media.\footnote{Lawson (2002: 61); Vanden Heuvel and Dennis (1993: 40).} Radio played a similarly marginal role in providing political information.\footnote{As of 2002, 15-20 percent of Mexicans received political information from radio (Lawson 2002: 98).} Radio stations prioritized music and sports. Besides urban commuters and poor or isolated individuals without access to television, few tuned into the radio for news (Lawson 2002: 98).

Control of the airwaves and, secondarily, print media conferred a major electoral advantage. Prior to the PRD’s emergence, over decades of single-party rule, the PRI had thoroughly penetrated national broadcast and print media through bribes, subsidies, penalties, and manipulation of broadcasting concessions. These measures resulted in a ‘docile’, ‘dependent’, and ‘captive media establishment that faithfully reflected the ruling party’s priorities’ (Lawson 2002: 8, 173). In exchange for the government favoritism and support necessary for their economic prosperity and elite status (Vanden Heuvel and Dennis 1993: 21), the major owners of Mexican media, a few dozen in total, helped set the public agenda in broad accord with PRI priorities, omitted sensitive, potentially damaging political developments from news programming, and broadcast open propaganda in support of the PRI and against PRI competitors (Lawson 2002: 8).

At the core of Mexico’s PRI-dominated media establishment lay the Televisa conglomerate (est. 1973). Ties between Televisa and the PRI ran deep. The Mexican television industry emerged in the early 1950s and took off in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s. From the 1950s onward, Televisa and its precursor, Telesistema Mexicano (est. 1953), received a succession of important concessions from PRI governments, including the country’s original broadcasting licenses and, subsequently, licenses to broadcast cable, satellite, and high-definition television (Lawson 2002: 29). These concessions and other forms of government favoritism, such as generous subsidies for infrastructural development, enabled Televisa to consolidate monopoly status in the critical television sector.

By the 1990s, Televisa commanded over four fifths of Mexico’s television audience and received a similar share of television advertising revenue (Lawson 2002: 29). In exchange for government support, Televisa, like the media establishment more generally, tailored its news programming in a variety of ways to benefit the PRI. In a telling quotation from the 54 According to Lawson (2002), before media liberalization, ‘Mexico’s media were thoroughly intertwined with the country’s one-party system’ (8).

55 ‘For more than two decades, Televisa and the PRI were deeply intertwined, with the network depending on the regime for concessions and infrastructure development, and the regime relying on Televisa for political marketing’ (Lawson 2002: 30).
mid-1990s, Televisa’s chief executive, Emilio Azcárraga Jr., described himself as a ‘soldier of the PRI’ and characterized the network as ‘part of the governmental system’ (Lawson 2002: 30).

Predictably, throughout the 1990s, and especially during the first half-decade of its existence, the PRD suffered from low access to media and high levels of media hostility. The Salinas administration, through the Secretaría de Gobernación, used carrots and sticks, in particular the provision and cancelation of concessions and subsidies, to manipulate news coverage in detriment to the PRD. In order to gain or retain access to critical government support, media practiced self-censorship, omitting coverage of the PRD and denying the party advertising space.

Practitioners of self-censorship included major print media outlets. Before the rise of the center-right Reforma (est. 1993), the news weekly Proceso was the only significant medium in Mexico, print or broadcast, ‘to consistently investigate and report on...‘closed’ topics’ and, more specifically, to provide a forum for left-wing political elites and intellectuals to communicate their views to a relatively large educated audience (Lawson 2002: 67).

Media manipulation mattered most, however, in the broadcast sectors. Mexico’s major television outlets, led by Televisa, created and reinforced perceptions of left marginality by systematically blacklisting Cárdenas and the PRD. A founding PRD elite and popular

56 PRI elites enjoyed similarly cozy relationships with subnational broadcasting outlets and major national newspapers including Excélsior, El Universal, El Sol, Noticias, El Diario de México, El Día, El Heraldo de México. Some of the PRI’s informal media alliances (e.g., with the Heraldo de México) dated back to the Mexican Revolution (Lawson 2002: 29-30).

57 In addition, neither the FDN nor the early PRD could afford major television and radio spots (Bruhn 1998: 280).

58 In conversation, Borjas qualified this point, describing the readership of left publications like Proceso as a ‘captive audience’. She emphasized that they already supported the PRD. In her view, it was only through broadcast media that the PRD might have reached politically disengaged, undecided, and skeptical voters (interview with Borjas).

59 On occasion, broadcast station owners explicitly pressured rank-and-file not to discuss Cárdenas or report movement leader stated that during early development, the PRD had no opportunities to disseminate a positive message via mass media. ‘It was completely closed’, he summarized.

Examples of PRD blacklisting abound. In the 1988 presidential campaign season, Cárdenas received under nine hours of airtime on Mexico’s most watched cable news program, 24 Horas, while Salinas received over one-hundred and forty hours. According to the Mexican Academy of Human Rights, Ernesto Zedillo (PRI), in the early months of the 1994 presidential campaign, received forty-six times more airtime than Cárdenas and Diego Fernández de Cevallos (PAN) combined. Cárdenas repeatedly experienced ‘the unforeseen cancellation of previously arranged media programs’ (Borjas 2003: 513), and during the NAFTA debates, the PRD’s ‘ability to affect public opinion was practically nonexistent’ due to informal media censorship (430-1). A party founder and ex-federal deputy recalled that in the smaller elections, early PRD candidates generally interviewed at independent radio stations with limited reach because the major networks, ‘sold’ to the PRI, denied access to the left opposition. In the rare events that PRD leaders received access to media, they often faced open hostility.

The paltry coverage of the PRD that media did provide highlighted ‘the violent, subversive, and dangerous character of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas and the party he led’ (Borjas 2003: 246). Throughout the PRD’s formative phase, mass media touted the PRI while depicting left critiques of the government. See, for example, Borjas (2003): 566).

65 The ‘counterpart’ of negative PRD coverage was positive PRI coverage (Lawson 2002: 52). While depicting the PRD as fringe and dangerous, media suppressed government criticism and cast the PRI as the party of security, prosperity, and public approval. In the 1988 presidential campaign, for example, Salinas ‘was Cárdenas and the PRD as a radical threat to social order. During the 1988 presidential campaign, national television programs cast Cárdenas as the favorite of radical fringe groups, especially Marxist student organizations. In response to anti-fraud protests of 1989-90, ‘mass media and official propaganda’ depicted the PRD as ‘a party of troublemakers who broke the law and disregarded institutions’ (Rodríguez n.d.: 288). During the 1991 congressional campaigns, media characterized the PRD as violent and conflictual, ignoring the party’s repeated condemnations of violent actions taken in the party’s name. In 1994, media stoked public fears of violence and disorder and attempted to resurrect the image of Cárdenas and the PRD as dangerous, zeroing in on Cárdenas’s meeting with Subcomandante Marcos of the Zapatista National Liberation Army. Portrayals of the early PRD as dangerous and destabilizing extended to state and local elections as well. One PRD scholar summed up the basic image of the PRD disseminated by television and other media outlets across the country: ‘Being a perredista was something really, really bad’.

always presented surrounded by multitudes’ (Rodríguez n.d.: 190), and Televisa ‘launched a systematic campaign...to sell President Carlos Salinas’ program of economic reform’ (Lawson 2002: 101). During the implementation of PRONASOL, Televisa ‘donated time for PRONASOL commercials, and its news programs gave priority to favorable coverage of the PRI’ (Bruhn 1998: 280). In 1993, Cárdenas stated that national media, due to pressure from the Salinas administration, were presenting an unrealistically positive image of Mexico to the United States (Proceso no. 847, 1/25/1993: 28). In the 1994 presidential campaign, there were twice as many positive PRI news stories as positive PRD news stories, and four times as many positive stories about Zedillo as about Cárdenas. Meanwhile, the PRI periodically censored critical media. For example, the Salinas government prohibited the circulation of allegedly defamatory publications such as Cambio 16 América, which accused Salinas of granting state favors to friends and family members (Borjas 2003: 435).

67According to Borjas (2003), coverage of marches, protests, and rallies ‘deepened the belligerent and violent images of the PRD that the media emphasized’ (477).

68During the election campaign, Televisa heavily covered violence in Guatemala, arguably with the intention to make voters more fearful, reactionary, and hence anti-PRD (Lawson 2002: 53-4).

69In the PRD’s early bids for the governorship of Michoacán, for example, local newspaper coverage of the PRD was scarce and negative (Bruhn 1998: 236), and local media disseminated PRI slogans including Your vote decides: three years of violence or three years of peace, and Order and stability are the goals (Beltrán del Río 1993: 114).

70Personal communication with Rodríguez, August 1, 2011.
As the left mobilizations of the late 1980s and early 1990s deintensified, news programs remained systematically critical of the PRD, but increasingly, instead of casting the PRD as a threat to social order, they structured their negative coverage around the party’s policy stances and initiatives. Leading television programs generously broadcast and independently reinforced PRI critiques of the PRD on key issues such as NAFTA and the Zapatista movement. Describing the 1994 election, Borjas (2003) writes that ‘the media, under the appearance of democracy, multiplied’ the airtime given to supporters of the Zedillo campaign ‘so that they could discredit or criticize [the opposition], above all the PRD’ (566). Journalists often received negative feedback, and occasionally outright dismissal, if they attempted to cover party disputes in a balanced manner. During the NAFTA debates, for example, several media commentators lost their jobs after reporting that prominent intellectuals and regional politicians in Mexico supported the PRD’s anti-NAFTA stance.\textsuperscript{71}

The combination of media hostility and low media access cost the PRD dearly in early elections. Gómez (1997: 16) attributes the PRD’s initial electoral weakness to two primary factors: PRI repression and, above all, the media’s perpetual ‘smear campaign’ (campaña de desprestigio). Similarly, Borjas (2003) identifies Mexican media’s hostility and informal censorship as a central determinant of the PRD’s electoral setbacks in 1991 and 1994: ‘With the help of the media’ in 1991, the PRI ‘recovered and maintained [the initiative] through the orchestration of a permanent campaign against the PRD’, and in 1994, the ‘fraud’ did not take place ‘in the voting booths’, but was ‘a process fundamentally based on inequality of resources and access to media and the [media’s]...manipulation of information’ (514-5, 571, 587).\textsuperscript{72}

\textsuperscript{71}This story was picked up by the New York Times, which increased international attention to press censorship. As a result, Mexico’s Director of Radio, Television, and Cinematography, in charge of private media regulation, resigned (Borjas 2003: 429).

Mexican media started to become more competitive and state-independent in the early to mid-1990s. Televisión Azteca was born in 1993 and, over the course of the decade, became consolidated as Televisa’s main competitor. The 1994 election included Mexico’s first ever televised presidential debate, featuring the PRI’s Ernesto Zedillo, Cárdenas, and the PAN’s Diego Fernández de Cevallos. Cárdenas began his opening remarks with the statement: ‘This opening of the media is, without a doubt, without any doubt, an achievement for those of us who, from distinct positions, from different organizations, are struggling for democratic change in our country’.

Yet media liberalization during the early to mid-1990s should not be overstated. The initial process of media opening occurred slowly and cautiously. Mexico’s major television news programs continued to provide circumscribed, unassertive reporting past the mid-1990s. Televisa’s political coverage remained ‘tentative and halting’, and ‘as late as 1996, only a small fraction [of its news coverage]...was devoted to...‘closed’ topics’ such as ‘official corruption, drug trafficking, electoral fraud, anti-government protests, and the Mexican military’ (Lawson 2002: 105). TV Azteca (est. 1993) did not provide ‘authentic’ news coverage during its early years, focusing primarily on entertainment (Lawson 2002: 104). Independent print media did not begin to take off until the mid-1990s, with the rise of Reforma, El Financiero, and La Jornada. Among these, only La Jornada was located on the left of the ideological spectrum.

Due to the four adverse conditions identified in this section – fraud, repression, resource disadvantage, and media blacklisting and hostility – the early PRD did not win any significant positions of power. In contrast to the PAN, the PRD did not win a single governorship or major mayoralty (save Morelia, Michoacán) before the late 1990s. In Mexico’s centralized, authoritarian political system, small mayoralities and minority legislative blocs at the state and federal levels, through the mid-1990s, did not give the PRD policy autonomy, control of large government agencies, or significant public financing. One party activist and scholar summarized in an interview that past the midpoint of the 1990s, ‘there was nothing to distribute’: no patronage, no salaried positions.

his 1997 victory in the Federal District possible. Also in 1997, the PRI experienced an unprecedented decline in popularity among Televisa viewers (Lawson 2002: 170). ‘By the late 1990s, Televisa had evolved from a private Ministry of Truth into a more typical commercial network’ (Lawson 2002: 10).

Yet even the media liberalization of the late 1990s should not be overstated. Lawson (2002) observes that media network owners, cross-nationally but especially in Mexico, tend to hold conservative views and tilt coverage in favor of conservatives: ‘Nowhere has this been clearer than in Mexico, where television coverage has been substantially more sympathetic to the PAN than to the PRD and remains constrained on any topics that might be construed as leftist (Lawson 2002: 208). Thus, in 2000, most mass media strongly opposed Cárdenas.

To the present, perceptions of media bias remain widespread within the PRD.

Partially as a result of the above developments – the 1996 reforms in finance and public media, the liberalization of private media – the PRD, in the late 1990s, began to invest more heavily in mass media initiatives and win more major elections. The new political party fund divided all registered parties’ yearly allotment into two categories: ordinary expenses and campaign expenses. In 1997, the first year in which registered parties received the enlarged party fund, the PRD’s CEN allocated seventy percent of its campaign expenses to television and radio advertisements and paid media spots (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 124). In the years 1997 to 1999, the PRD won its first major executive victories. In 1997, Cárdenas prevailed in the first ever election for jefe de gobierno of the Federal District, the second most important 82 At the federal and subnational levels, perredista activists and elites repeatedly complain of unbalanced coverage on the part of private media, especially Televisa. Such complaints proliferated and intensified after the 2006 and 2012 presidential elections, during which PRD supporters alleged systematic smear campaigns against Andrés Manuel López Obrador. The Yo Soy 132 social movement, created in the lead-up to the 2012 election, lists as its central goal the democratization of Mexican politics and media.

elected office in the country. In 1998 and 1999, the PRD won its first three governorships in Zacatecas, Tlaxcala, and Baja California del Sur.

Access to mobilizing structures during the PRD’s formative phase

The PRD’s early adversity shaped elite electoral strategies. With very little access to state resources, finance, and media, the PRD leadership had limited options for building electoral support. Television, radio, and most newspapers cast the party in a negative light and denied party leaders meaningful opportunities to counter this image. The party controlled no important governments – just a small number of resource-strapped municipalities – and thus could not build a reputation, even subnationally, for effective governance. Given the party’s lack of access to state patronage, public finance, and private finance, candidates could not run professional campaigns with teams of consultants and strategists and armies of electoral workers, all incentivized by salaries or promises of government spoils. The PRD would rise or fall, in large measure, on the strength of its volunteer ground organization.

PRD founders understood this. Resource asymmetries, media ostracism, and media disinformation all rankled the party elite. Proceso featured numerous exposés of the Mexican television industry, often written by PRD intellectuals and elites, which focused on the major networks’ right-wing bias and hostility toward the left opposition. Candidate speeches and campaign pamphlets treated local PRD activists as essential to the party’s success: only the militancia, these materials emphasized, could neutralize the negative influence of media by delivering the PRD’s unfiltered message to voters. Four party founders emphasized, in interviews with the author, that media blacklisting and PRI political hegemony made the PRD’s ground campaigners fundamental.\textsuperscript{85} Borjas (2003) finds that in the early 1990s, penury and media ostracism dictated PRD strategy, impelling party candidates to base their campaigns on exhaustive local tours and large rallies in town plazas (486).\textsuperscript{86}

Elite incentives, however, were not sufficient for the emergence of a strong PRD organization. Low access to media and state resources gave PRD elites an incentive but not the capacity to acquire activist networks and organizational infrastructure in large swathes of the national territory. Lacking resources, the central PRD office could not finance or administer the formation of thousands of local party branches. Early organizational expansion could only occur from the bottom up, through the initiative, and with the dispersed resources, of local civil society leaders and the organized networks under their control. Access to preexisting civil society structures and opposition party networks gave PRD elites the capacity, or means, for organizational implantation.

On creation, the PRD embarked on a mission of large-scale, base-level expansion, seeking to establish local committees in as much of the national territory as possible.\textsuperscript{87} Acutely aware of the national party’s resource constraints, the PRD leadership set out in 1989 to forge linkages with leaders from across Mexican civil society; in Porfirio Muñoz Ledo’s words, ‘to base the party on what existed’.\textsuperscript{88} With contact and encouragement but little aid or oversight from the PRD’s central office, local leaders took it upon themselves to organize local PRD branches and nuclei. In a rejection of PRI-style corporatism, the PRD prohibited feeder organizations from transferring their members to the PRD as a single bloc, at least formally.

\textsuperscript{86}‘The insufficiency of economic resources limited the penetration of PRD campaigns, given that, in addition to being ostracized by the media, the PRD could not buy advertising space... Under these circumstances, the PRD’s electoral strategy [in the early 1990s] remained based on direct contact with the people through candidates’ exhaustive local tours and the organization of rallies in all the main plazas’ (Borjas 2003: 486).

\textsuperscript{88}Interview with Muñoz Ledo.
The PRD ‘sought to become a party of citizens based on individual membership...in which the axis of party life was participation in the comité de base’ (Rodríguez n.d.: 254).

For most of the twentieth century, the Mexican Communist Party (PCM, est. 1919) dominated Mexico’s Marxist landscape. Yet in the late 1960s, due to the background influence of the Cuban Revolution and the galvanizing effects of the Díaz Ordaz (PRI) government’s violent repression of UNAM students, new Marxist parties, organizations, urban and rural guerrilla groups, and intellectual cliques proliferated. Some were PCM splinter groups. Both the traditional Marxist parties and most of the social left organizations that would eventually feed into the PRD emerged from this period of new Marxist ferment in Mexico.

During the 1970s and 1980s, as a consequence of diminishing repression and increasing political liberalization, much of Mexico’s new Marxist left moderated. These groups ended or reduced their participation in ‘extraparliamentary’ forms of struggle, including guerrilla warfare, and created political parties for the purposes of electoral participation. Heberto Castillo, later to become the most important Marxist founder of the PRD, created the Mexican Workers’ Party (PMT) in 1974, after spending two years in prison from 1969 to 1971. Other important parliamentary Marxist parties founded between the mid-1970s and early 1980s include the Trotskyist Socialist Workers’ Party (PST, est. 1975), the Trotskyist Revolutionary Workers’ Party (PRT, 1976), and the Revolutionary Patriotic Party (PPR, est. early 1980s). The PPR was an insurgent successor party, founded by members of the urban Liga Comunista 23 de Septiembre, Mexico’s strongest guerrilla organization. These actors, together with the PCM, came to compose the traditional Marxist left.

From the mid-1970s to the late 1980s, the parties and groups of the parliamentary Marxist left, separated for decades due to rigid sectarian divisions, forged a succession of electoral alliances. First, in 1976, the still-proscribed PCM joined with a group of smaller parties to form the Left Coalition (Coalición de Izquierda, or CI), an alliance backing the 1976 presidential bid of the PCM’s Valentín Campa, a railway union leader and former political prisoner. Salazar received 600,000 votes, registered as invalid due to the legal ban on left opposition parties. The growing strength of the organized left opposition led the PRI regime, in 1977, to lift the legal ban on left opposition parties. The PCM and PST quickly obtained registries, and several small parties united with the PCM to contest the 1979 midterms. The PCM won 703,000 votes, consolidating its status as Mexico’s third electoral force.

The creation of the PSUM marked an important step in the unification of Mexico’s traditional Marxist left, but the process would culminate in the formation of the PMS. Like the 1982 presidential election, the 1988 election gave Mexico’s still-fragmented traditional Marxist left an incentive to seek even greater unity. In 1988, the PSUM dissolved itself and transferred its registry to the new PMS, which absorbed, in addition to the PSUM, six Marxist parties and organizations: Heberto Castillo’s PMT, the PRT, a defecting faction of the PST led by Jesús Ortega, the Union of the Communist Left (UIC), and the more radical Revolutionary People’s Movement (MRP, est. mid-1960s) and aforementioned PPR (Hernández 2010: 36).

The creation of the PMS marked the culmination of a decades-long process of left unification. When the PMS nominated Heberto Castillo as its candidate for the 1988 presidential election, the party claimed a broader coalition of left forces than any left party in Mexican history. As discussed earlier, however, Cárdenas’s independent 1988 presidential bid rapidly eclipsed Castillo’s and threatened the PMS’s survival. Consequently, the PMS retired Castillo’s candidacy, joined the FDN, and in 1989, dissolved itself and transferred its registry to the PRD. The PRD thus inherited the PMS wholesale.

The PMS claimed party representatives and local or regional branches across the national territory. On adopting the PMS’s registry, the PRD inherited several thousand PMS members and activists, a network of offices (particularly in large urban areas), and additional organizational resources (e.g., telephones). Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, the PRD’s first national Secretary of Organization, recalled that during the late 1980s, the national PRD leadership contacted or visited PMS offices across the country in order to develop an initial territorial network of local PRD nuclei. The PMS’s national headquarters, located at Monterrey 50 in the Federal District, became the PRD’s first national headquarters.

Yet the PMS’s role in the PRD’s territorial implantation should not be overstated. The PMS’s most critical contribution lay in the provision of experienced, educated elites and cuadros. A disproportionate number of these individuals rose to positions of national leadership and won major offices. The party’s several thousand members, however, did not represent a significant share of the PRD’s mass base. As Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas observed in a 2001 interview: ‘I would say that the PMS is an organization that comes with many cuadros but without a broad popular base in general terms’ \(^92\) To build a mass base, the PRD depended much more heavily on the extraparliamentary social left and, to a lesser extent, the defecting PRI.

Following the PRI’s brutal repression of students in 1968, many left organizations, in contrast to the above Marxist parties, continued to reject institutional politics and engage in social struggle throughout the 1970s and 1980s. These organizations disdained elections, detested the PRI, claimed ‘férreas militancias’ (iron-willed activist bases), and engaged in ‘warlike (including armed) forms of struggle’ (Martínez 2005: 53, 55). Many included individuals who had split from traditional Marxist parties or taken up parallel activities after 1968.

The social left organizations that fed into the PRD, almost all of which had actively supported the FDN in the 1988 presidential campaign, either possessed large social bases or, more commonly, strong ties to organizations with large social bases. Key social left feeder organizations with large bases included the National Worker and Peasant Council of Mexico (CNOCM); the Democratic Peasant Union (UCD); the University Student Council; \(^93\)

the Worker, Peasant, and Student Coalition of the Istmo (COCEI, est. 1976); the Popular Urban Movement (est. 1985) and, within it, the Asamblea de Barrios (est. 1987); the University Student Council (CEU, est. 1986); and the peasant-based Cardenista National Council (CNC).

Those with strong ties to large social bases included parties and cliques such as the Organización Revolucionaria Punto Crítico (ORPC, est. 1972), a Mexico City-based Marxist organization founded by student movement leaders and in charge of the influential left magazine, Revista Punto Crítico; the Popular Action Movement (MAP, est. 1980), an ORPC splinter; the Línea de Masas faction of the Maoist Revolutionary Leftist Organization (OIR-LM, est. 1981); the Revolutionary People’s Movement (MRP, est. 1981); the Maoist Revolutionary National Civic Association (ACNR, est. 1982), a nucleus of former guerrillas; the Revolutionary Patriotic Party (PPR, est. early 1980s), also a member of the PMS; the Green Party (PV, est. 1986); the Movement Toward Socialism (est. March 1988), a PRT splinter; the Grupo Poliforum; the Liberal Party; and Democratic Convergence. These cliques and small parties claimed strong ties to a range of organized social sectors, including peasants (ACNR), urban popular movements (ORPC), student associations in Mexico City, Guerrero and elsewhere (MAS, ACNR), left teachers’ unions such as STUNAM and the CNTE (MAP, OIR-LM), left blue-collar unions (MAP), and post-materialist movements (PV).

Although a wide range of social left actors contributed to the organizational development of the PRD, rural unions and urban popular movements played the most important role in creating permanent PRD base-level structures (Rodríguez n.d.: 257-8). Peasant unions played an especially critical role in southern Mexico. Rural worker associations provided ex-

The aforementioned CNOCM, a confederation of progressive rural and urban unions that had split from the Mexican Workers’ Confederation to support Cárdenas’s 1988 presidential bid,\footnote{Cárdenas (2010).} gave the PRD an organized rural base in Michoacán, Guerrero, Oaxaca, Chiapas, Tabasco, and Veracruz. According to Bruhn (1998), local branches of the Democratic Peasant Union (UCD) simply became local PRD committees in many cases: ‘Membership of local PRD/UCD committees often overlapped nearly 100 percent’ (225). One PRD founder described rural unions as the early PRD’s ‘spinal cord’ in large parts of the southern ‘peasant states’\footnote{Interview with Gamundi.}

The Popular Urban Movement (MUP) – and especially the Asamblea de Barrios, which the MUP produced – played an indispensable role in the early PRD’s organization-building in Mexico City. The MUP (est. 1985) emerged in response to Mexico City’s devastating 1985 earthquake. The earthquake wrought havoc on the city’s vast popular neighborhoods, destroying homes and the supporting infrastructural systems. Widespread dissatisfaction with the pace and scope of the de la Madrid administration’s response sparked the MUP, which involved an unprecedented flowering of neighborhood associations dedicated to housing rights advocacy and community reconstruction. Hérmandez (2010) identifies the 1985 earthquake as the most significant event for the development of Mexican civil society that had occurred in decades (35).

With the rise of the MUP, popular urban sectors, traditionally a PRI constituency, defected to the opposition. Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, in a 2009 interview, summarized that ‘the citizenry, confronting the inadequacy of the de la Madrid administration, organized itself, and the government’s authority in [Mexico City] was over’\footnote{20 años del PRD: Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, May 22, 2009.} The city’s proliferating neighborhood associations united to form numerous umbrella organizations. In 1987, the largest of these, the Coordinadora Única de Damnificados, dissolved into an even larger confederation, the Asamblea de Barrios. Months after Cárdenas announced his candidacy, the Asamblea endorsed him. Other important Cárdenas allies from the MUP included the Unión de Colonias Populares and the Frente Popular Francisco Villa. These organizations fed into the PRD on its founding.

In the Federal District, the PRD inherited a mass activist base and dense grassroots structures from the MUP. In the late 1980s, the Asamblea alone claimed 60,000 member families, an estimated eighty-five percent of whom became perredistas. One PRD founder and early federal deputy summarized that the MUP enabled the PRD to move beyond university students and radical unions and become rooted in mass society. MUP leaders mobilized neighborhood activists and groups into local PRD committees. Many became PRD candidates for public office. The Asamblea lent Cárdenas and the PRD key assets, including panel trucks for campaigning. Such was the Asamblea’s contribution to Cárdenas and the 103 Local PRD committees, Bruhn (1998) writes, tended ‘to coalesce around preexisting pockets of movement organization’, particularly those connected to the Asamblea (226). A PRD founder and early federal deputy recalls that in the Federal District, PRD activist groups were ‘transplanted’ from urban popular movements (interview with Flores). Another PRD founder early federal deputy states, similarly, that he and other urban popular movement leaders mobilized PRD support in their movements’ neighborhood strongholds (interview with Saucedo). Both interviewees drew on their recognition and support among the movement base to build large, local constituencies and launch successful campaigns for federal deputy (interview with Flores).

104 Successful federal deputy candidates drawn from urban popular movements included Marco Rascón and Francisco Saucedo of the Asamblea, Cuauhtémoc ‘Memo’ Flores of the Coordinadora única de Damnificados, Alejandro Luebano of COPEDI and the Unión de Colonias Populares, and René Bejarano of the Unión Popular Nuevo Tenochtitlán.

105 When campaigning in Mexico City in 1988, Cárdenas made many of his appearances in the Barrio Móvil,
PRD that, in the words of one movement leader, the Asamblea ‘destroyed (deshizo) the PRI’ in the Federal District.\(^{106}\)

Mexico’s social left movements and organizations, taken together, provided the PRD with a larger social base than any other feeder category. In addition, the social left furnished a large number of experienced leaders and cuadros who occupied important positions in national and subnational party organs. These individuals exerted a profound influence on activist formation and discussions of party program and tactics. Early party meetings, for example, predominantly consisted of radical activists and intellectuals.\(^{107}\) One ex-member of the ORPC recalls that groups like Punto Crítico played a critical role in educating PRD activists and leading discussions of political theory and coyunturas. These contributions, he stated, fueled the political and ideological struggle.\(^{108}\)

It should also be noted, finally, that many perredistas of extraparliamentary Marxist origin viewed the PRD as a stage, important but temporary, in a longer-term struggle for revolutionary, socialist change in Mexico.\(^{109}\) A significant fraction of these individuals, after joining the PRD, maintained parallel, clandestine activities, especially until the mid-1990s.

Ex-PRI networks

During the PRD’s early years, ex-PRI networks furnished key human and organizational resources in several states, especially Michoacán and Tabasco.\(^{110}\) Michoacán constituted the primary bastion of cardenismo and perredismo throughout the formative phase. Lázaro Cárdenas served as the governor of Michoacán from 1928 to 1930, and Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas served in the same position from 1980 to 1986. Prior to the creation of the FDN and PRD, a large fraction of Michoacán’s electorate identified as cardenista, not priísta. Thus, when Cárdenas defected, most of the PRI organization and electorate defected with him. In the 1988 election, Cárdenas received the majority of the state’s vote. On formation, the PRD in Michoacán inherited a large network of ex-PRI cardenista supporters, activists, and cuadros. In a 1992 edition of Proceso, Porfirio Muñoz Ledo estimated that in Michoacán, ‘98 percent of our militantes and cuadros were from the PRI.’ Of the three-hundred mid-level leaders (cuadros) who defected from the PRI 1988, two-hundred and fifty hailed from Michoacán (De la Madrid 2004). Fernández (2003) states that the PRD of Michoacán came whole and ready-made (en forma integra) from the PRI. The PRD also inherited valuable organizational assets such as offices, computers, and telephones.

\(^{109}\) For example, one early PRD federal deputy, a Marxist and MUP member, recalled that when he joined the party, he believed that revolution would ultimately prove necessary, but that achieving electoral success would help the left acumular fuerzas, or amass power (interview with Flores).

Ex-PRI networks also played a key role in the PRD’s early implantation in Tabasco. Beginning in 1989, the first president of the PRD’s Tabasco office, ex-priísta and CD member Andrés Manuel López Obrador (AMLO), built a statewide network of precinct-level PRD committees (comités de sección). He based these committees on a similar network of PRI committees that, as Tabasco’s PRI president in 1983, he had helped develop and integrate horizontally. In 1993 and 1994, AMLO, in anticipation of the 1994 gubernatorial race, undertook a second major organizational push, to impressive effect. Building on his initial network of local PRD comités, AMLO spearheaded a new, major recruitment effort, resulting in a surge of PRD members and local nuclei. By 1995, the PRD claimed a higher

In sum, while low access to state and media made territorial implantation electorally vital for Mexico’s new left, access to human and organizational resources from the traditional Marxist left, social left, and former PRI made it possible: ‘The credit for the PRD’s territorial implantation fundamentally goes to the work carried out by leaders and members of the local organizations and movements that were incorporated into the party...[and] contributed human and material resources to party implantation’ (Borjas 2003: 245).\textsuperscript{115}

The early PRD’s organizational strength

Within several years of its creation, the PRD had built a territorial infrastructure that, in reach and density, rivaled or surpassed that of nearly every new left party in Latin America on a comparable timeline, including Brazil’s PT.\textsuperscript{116} The party claimed roughly 700,000 members in late 1991 and, by 1995, over one-million.\textsuperscript{117}

Geographical unevenness followed from the diffuse, bottom-up nature of the early PRD’s organization-building. In the territorial bastions of the PRD’s organized allies, PRD branches proliferated. Elsewhere, few branches materialized.\textsuperscript{118} Early perredistas heavily populated \textsuperscript{115}Similarly, an early activist recalls that the PRD became territorially rooted through locally implanted organizations, especially where big leaders of social movements operated (interview with Ávila).

\textsuperscript{116}Although the PRD, in regional comparative perspective, has a high level of territorial rootedness, PRD members and analysts tend to downplay or deny the party’s infrastructural strength. In interviews, dozens of party elites and activists described the party as infrastructurally weak. This assessment usually resulted from comparing the PRD to the PRI, which has penetrated every region of Mexico.

\textsuperscript{117}First statistic from Borjas (2003: 371).

\textsuperscript{118}One PRD leader and federal deputy states that wherever the early PRD received significant support, it came from already-organized left groups (interview with Flores). Borjas (2003) writes of the PRD’s the Federal District, Mexico state, and much of the South, but not the North or, for the most part, Central Mexico. At the PRD’s first two Congresses, the largest delegations came from the Federal District and Mexico State, Michoacán, Veracruz, and Tabasco.\footnote{Borjas (2003): 371 fn. 284, 532.}

By 1993, the PRD had set up a party office in every municipality of Michoacán and established a ‘significant presence’, proportional to population, in six additional states: Chiapas, Guerrero, Oaxaca, Hidalgo, Tlaxcala, and Zacatecas.\footnote{The party had a weaker, but moderate, presence in Aguascalientes, Baja California, the Federal District, Jalisco, Mexico state, and Nuevo León (Borjas 2003: 518).} Throughout this period, the PRD claimed a strong, active base in the Federal District and, to a lesser extent, Mexico state, but given high population size in both \textit{entidades federativas}, the party’s proportional presence was comparatively weak. In 1994, due to electoral mobilization for the presidential and gubernatorial contests, the PRD’s percent membership in the Federal District and Tabasco skyrocketed. As of 1995, the party’s member/population ratio in these two \textit{entidades} surpassed those in all other Mexican states\footnote{See Borjas 2003, vol II: 74.} and the majority of PRD members, nationally, resided in six \textit{entidades}: the Federal District, Michoacán, Tabasco, Veracruz, Oaxaca, and Guerrero.\footnote{Borjas (2003, vol. II): 74, 87-8.}

In sum, the PRD, during its first half-decade, built a strong organization with over 1000 municipal offices, roughly one-million members, and a mass activist base, concentrated primarily in the Federal District, Mexico state, and the Southern region. PRD activists, the lifeblood of this organization, possessed high levels of partisan commitment, enthusiasm, and drive. In unprompted recollections, various PRD founders vividly attested to this fact, describing the early militancia as a mass of enthusiastic volunteers characterized by idealism, a willingness to work around other important responsibilities, a knack for creative grassroots mobilization, and an aversion to central features of modern Mexican campaigning such as patronage, clientelism, paid media spots, and political professionalism.

that early PRD activists enjoyed party work. Another party founder and MUP member stated that for most early PRD militantes, political activism was ‘natural’ and the concept of political professionalization almost non-existent. More clinically, one party activist and scholar stated that the ‘psychological benefits’ of participation drove the early PRD’s ‘big volunteer army’. A founding PRD member, formerly of the PSM, described the PRD’s convocation as a ‘great outpouring’ of spontaneous, vigorous debate and analysis among thousands of members and numerous small parties and organizations. In early speeches, party elites frequently trumpeted the PRD’s spirit of volunteerism and contrasted the PRD’s creative and spirited grassroots campaigns with the money-fueled, professional campaigns of the PRI. One interviewee fondly recalled early PRD propaganda as highly ‘artisanal’ (artesanal) and stated that creative, low-budget propaganda had more credibility than a ‘[expletive] TV ad’.

A PRD founder and intellectual stated, without prompting, that the party’s mass reserve of enthusiastic, spontaneous volunteer activism constituted its core strength and comparative advantage. For no other party during the early 1990s, he said, did small groups of individuals routinely engage in spontaneous grassroots activities such as writing PRD slogans on asphalt sidewalks. One early PRD activist noted the absence of bureaucracy and structure during early ground campaigns and also highlighted the untutored quality of his and others’ early party work. He and fellow activists, he said, allocated time outside of their work and study schedules and improvised with little supervision, campaigning door-to-door,

128 Along these lines, one PRD founder and future federal deputy from Mexico state, in a 2010 interview, described doing party work in the evening, after classes: ‘When I began as a PRD activist, I studied at painting graffiti on walls, and distributing locally produced fliers. He recalled that many such individuals, including he, continued their party work between election campaigns, with a focus during these periods on forging ties to popular organizations. All these efforts, he stated, were spontaneous and decentralized, with each activist aware that s/he needed to make a contribution to building the PRD.

One interviewee emphasized that during the ‘artisanal’ period, early PRD militantes typically invested at least some of their energy in local elections. Since effective ground campaigns conferred a potentially decisive advantage in smaller elections, he stated, many activists assigned top priority to local contests and devoted most of their party work to local candidates. These individuals did not expect the PRD to win national power easily. On the contrary, they expected, even welcomed, a gradual, bottom-up transformation of Mexico’s political system, in which the left would amass victories and governing experience at the local and state levels before winning control of the federal government. In 1991, the national leadership followed the base’s lead by establishing its first set of official principles and guidelines for PRD municipal governments.

What factors account for the commitment and enthusiasm of the PRD base? Selection pressures played an important role. The PRD’s early adversity, in addition to shaping elite electoral strategies, created selection pressures at the base level. Active participation in the early PRD presupposed a willingness to do party work without a salary or the credible promise of a government job. The party’s first national Secretary of Organization, Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, deftly noted in an early Proceso article that ‘we live by substituting good faith and enthusiasm for resources’.[133] Bruhn (1998) notes that most early perredistas also paid less visible costs, having ‘to take time out of profitable work activities’ and expend income on fuel, food, and travel lodging (286). For many, participation in the PRD required a willingness to put one’s own safety at risk, especially in the more violent southern states.

132 Initially, the PRD possessed clear national objectives (e.g., democratization, defeating the PRI, rolling back neoliberalism), but the party ‘did not consider an initial proposal for winning state and local governments’. In 1991, the national party, ‘aware of the importance of winning positions at diverse levels of government’, organized a national municipal assembly and produced a multipoint set of guidelines for PRD municipal governments (Baptista 2010: 175). Six more assemblies would follow, and in 1997, the national PRD would create two organs, the Institute of Municipal Development (IDM) and the Mexican Association of Local Authorities (AALMAC), to support its municipal governments (Baptista 2010: 175-6).
Rodríguez (n.d.) thus writes that ‘being a victim of persecution and exclusion, experiencing electoral fraud, even losing one’s life were constant possibilities for party activists’ (284, emphasis added).

Unremunerated labor, dim short-term electoral prospects, and the threat of violence and murder discouraged political careerists (arribistas), opportunists, and patronage-seekers from joining the early PRD. The PRD’s adverse formative phase thus selected for militantes creyentes, committed activists who sincerely believed in the PRD’s causes. Greene (2007) finds evidence of these selection effects. Individuals who joined the early PRD in years of heightened resource asymmetry and repression, he shows, held more extreme left-wing views on economic policy and democracy, holding constant economic development, a host of demographic variables, and activists’ formal position in the PRD hierarchy (158, 305).[134]

One party activist and scholar stated in an interview that conditions during the PRD’s early development were ‘very difficult’, but that this difficulty helped the party. Because the early PRD had very few opportunities to win important elections, she stated, the party ‘couldn’t

[134] In particular, many of the PRD’s early ideologues ‘came from Mexico’s older, radical left’ (Greene 2007:
164) and had themselves ‘been recruited into the opposition when joining was such a high cost and low benefit activity that only relative extremists found it worthwhile to do so’ (94-5).
be a business’. Perredistas joined for other reasons, like ideological conviction. \(^{135}\) Borjas (2003) also suggests the existence of selection effects, writing that ‘the repression exercised by the government led...to the despondency and desertion of the FDN’s base’ in ‘many cases’, but not for the most strong-willed individual and group supporters (341, 245).

Selection pressures alone, however, cannot account for the commitment of early PRD activists. Even if a particular set of conditions selects for committed activists, individuals and groups will not donate their time, energy, and resources to a party-building project unless driven by a positive higher cause. Party-building commitment on a national scale presupposes a higher cause of national import, around which large, heterogeneous, and dispersed segments of a population can unite and rally. Independently of selection pressures, such a cause, in a given context, may or may not emerge.

Steven Levitsky and his collaborators have argued that periods of national polarization and conflict often produce the higher causes necessary for large-scale, volunteer collective action and party-building (Levitsky et al. n.d.). The early PRD conforms to this pattern. Intense polarization and conflict between Mexico’s governing powers and left opposition during the late 1980s and early 1990s generated the common causes that fueled early PRD activists. Cardenismo, the broad movement that fed into the PRD, both reflected and contributed to this polarization.

By the late 1980s, the PRI, governing amid economic and humanitarian crisis and failing to respond adequately, could no longer legitimate its rule by citing strong performance. In increasing numbers, Mexican voters and civil society organizations began to defect from the PRI and join the opposition. The marginalization of the Corriente Democrático, headed by Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, revealed the PRI’s internal resistance to change. When Cárdenas defected from the PRI to mount an opposition presidential bid, the anti-PRI resentment within civil society and the broader electorate found a positive outlet. A heterogeneous front of left elites and civil society actors, despite weak horizontal linkages and manifold differences, united around a single cause: to defeat a dominant party that, in their view, had committed to a failed, right-wing economic model and proven unresponsive to internal and external demands for economic reform and social justice. Cárdenas offered the national clout necessary to make this cause reality.

Paradoxically, the PRI’s fraudulent, repressive response to cardenismo strengthened the left opposition by hardening activist commitments. During Salinas’s sexenio, national PRI politicians and leaders and subnational authorities stole the presidency, stole governorships, stole mayoralities, killed scores of left activists, manipulated the media establishment, and channeled vast resources, all in order to cow and defeat the FDN and PRD. For perredistas, the Salinas administration and subnational PRI oligarchies, during this period, went well beyond their original crimes, revealing that they would stop at nothing to retain power.

As the political establishment employed the full powers of the Mexican state to keep the left in the political wilderness, activist anger and defiance mounted, and mobilization increased. Fraud across levels of government provoked a steady stream of left mobilization from 1988 to the mid-1990s. As discussed earlier, Cárdenas’s defeat provoked a sustained mass movement that eventuated in the creation of the PRD. Also in 1988, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the FDN’s gubernatorial candidate in Tabasco, officially lost to the PRI’s Salvador Neme Castillo, alleged fraud, and organized a series of mass actions to protest the new government, including rallies and blockades of highways and gas stations. Throughout 1989 and 1990, as the PRI systematically defrauded the PRD in municipal elections across the country, PRD supporters and activists mobilized at the local level, staged marches, blocked highways, and occupied city halls. In 1991, AMLO organized his first ‘exodus for democracy’ from Tabasco to Mexico City in protest of municipal-level fraud. The same year, in San Luis Potosí, PRD activists carried out a long series of mass demonstrations and marches to protest the illegitimate triumph of Fausto Zapata (PRI) over the PRD’s Salvador Nava. Similar demonstrations occurred after gubernatorial elections in Michoacán in 1992 and Guerrero in 1993. In 1994, AMLO lost his second bid for the Tabasco governorship, this time to Roberto Madrazo (PRI). In 1995, presenting copious evidence of electoral fraud and other abuses, AMLO organized his second ‘exodus for democracy’, leading 2500 PRD activists to Mexico City to protest the Tabasco results as well as systematic fraud at the national level.

To an even greater extent than systematic fraud, however, the use of violence and repression by subnational PRI authorities strengthened the PRD cause. Violence against the left galvanized the PRD base, motivated new entrants and generated cohesion. According to the testimony of numerous party founders, the repression of the Salinas years hardened PRD activists. Instead of retreating or exiting politics, most perredistas became more resolute in the face of violence. According to Borjas (2003), ‘the repression exercised by the government...contributed to unifying and strengthening the convergence of distinct groups and citizens generally who resolved to unite to resist governmental violence’ (341). In 1992, Porfirio Muñoz Ledo wrote in Proceso: ‘Every time the PRI confronts us directly...the party

137 Tellingly, the PRI refused to cede the governorship to the PRD after Fausto Zapata’s resignation, even though in the same year, the PRI did cede the governorship of Guanajuato to PAN candidate, Carlos Medina Plascencia, in response to weaker anti-fraud protests by PAN activists.

139 The protesters also addressed issues such as the potential privatization of Pemex.

140 In addition to galvanizing the existing base, the PRD’s David and Goliath-like struggle against the PRI may also have inspired and activated previously inactive individuals and supporters. Borjas (2003, vol. II) argues that the PRD’s ‘elevated territorial coverage’ in Michoacán, Guerrero, and Chiapas ‘can be attributed precisely to repression as a source of party members’ cohesion, resistance, and activism’ (vol. II: 245).

unifies, strengthens inside, works toward a tighter coordination and deeper solidarity. It isn’t new that adversity unifies.\footnote{Proceso no. 820, 7/20/1992, p. 10.}

For many perredistas, PRI violence transformed the conflict between the political establishment and left opposition into a war. When asked why the PRD did not fold after the disastrous 1991 elections (about which more below), one party founder from San Luis Potosí replied simply: ‘We were at war’\footnote{Interview with Nava.} In a 2010 interview, party founder and early federal deputy Carlos Navarrete stated:

[The Salinas sexenio] was a very hard time because our struggle was against the current. They were times of persecution, of hundreds of dead activists. They were times in which they stole elections from us, covering the width and depth of the country. They were times in which the government besieged us. They were times of resistance, fundamentally, of not giving up, of maintaining and raising our flags.\footnote{Interview with Navarrete in González et al., eds. (2010: 265).}

Martínez (2005) observes that, as late as 1994, most of the PRD opposed negotiation with the PRI due to the party’s ‘warlike relationship’ (beligerante trato) with Carlos Salinas (70-1). In major speeches, party leaders frequently paid tribute to fallen perredistas. In his acceptance of the PRD’s nomination for the 1994 presidential campaign, for example, Cárdenas commemorated the 239 party members murdered thus far (Borjas 2003: 512): ‘We must honor those who, with their sacrifices and their lives, made it possible for us to arrive at this day: hundreds of deaths for democracy across the country have been a harsh price paid by all Mexican people.’\footnote{Proceso, no. 1101, December 7, 1994, pp. 6-15. Cited in Borjas (2003, vol. II): 161.} In 2010, the PRD produced a hardback commemorating the party’s twenty-year anniversary. There were two dedications, the first ‘to those who lost their lives in the struggle to build the Party of the Democratic Revolution’ (González et al., eds., 2010).\footnote{The second was to the militancia.}
The fraud and repression of the Salinas years remain salient for the PRD’s early elites and activists and continue to inform their perspectives, behaviors, and collective identity. Party founder and current party president Jesús Zambrano (2011-14) recalled in a 2010 interview that following the ‘imposition’ of Salinas, neoliberalism became consolidated, and the left experienced ‘the most brutal repression’ in its history, with over 600 deaths during the Salinas sexenio. Party members González et al., eds. (2010) describe the Salinas years as ‘the hardest moments for the PRD. In this period we have 500 PRD deaths, the stolen election in Michoacán, such a grave problem in the Guerrero election, and the exodus for democracy in Tabasco’.[147] Many perredistas of long standing still consider electoral fraud endemic in Mexico.[148] Others lament that newer generations of perredistas lack an awareness of the party’s adverse origins. In the words of party founder and early Texcoco mayor, Horacio Duarte: ‘When you talk to [19- and 20-year olds] about how hard it was to build the PRD opposite a PRI government, they don’t understand you because they didn’t live through that period’.[149]

In summary, due to circumstances of adversity and the elite incentives, selection pressures, and activist orientations that flowed from these circumstances, the early PRD constructed a strong organization composed of committed activists. By the mid-1990s, the party had recruited over one-million members and built municipal offices in most Mexican municipalities. Early perredistas were primarily left ideologues and principled opponents of the PRI. They were not driven by selective incentives, as PRD elites had few selective incentives to offer.

[148] After the 2006 presidential election, perredistas, despite a high degree of skepticism within the broader electorate, overwhelmingly believed that Andrés Manuel López Obrador had lost due to fraud. For two months after the election, hundreds of thousands of perredistas, perhaps millions, participated in mass demonstrations, rallies, marches, and encampments.

[149] Interview with Duarte in González et al., eds. (2010: 249).
In contrast to patronage-seekers, the local leaders and activists who built the PRD were not likely to defect from the partisan left in the absence of short-term payoffs or government spoils. They genuinely believed in the party’s cause: to defeat the violently authoritarian PRI, halt the advance of neoliberalism, and usher in an era of progressive, democratic change in Mexico, all under the moral leadership of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas.

Electoral crisis and survival in 1991 and 1994

Greene (2007) argues that the PRD’s early joiners hurt the party by supporting unelectable candidates and promoting radical, unpopular policy stances. This account passes over an important point: the commitment of the PRD’s early joiners, rooted in opposition to PRI authoritarianism and neoliberalism and hardened by PRI hostility and violence, made the PRD more durable during the formative phase. Early activists did not join the PRD because they expected a quick, easy route to national power and the associated spoils. They believed in the PRD’s cause and accepted, even welcomed, the prospect of an extended, hard-fought struggle. Partisan belief and commitment extended their time horizons, steeling them against early electoral setbacks.

In particular, organizational strength and activist commitment contributed decisively to the PRD’s survival of early electoral crises in 1991 and 1994. The PRD suffered major electoral setbacks in both years, first in the Chamber of Deputies and second in the presidential election. In both cases, networks of committed activists rebounded and redoubled their efforts in the party’s territorial strongholds.

Memories of the 1988 general election lifted the early PRD’s electoral expectations. The FDN elected almost thirty percent of Mexico’s federal deputies, and Cárdenas won the presidential contest on most accounts. Subsequently, perredista candidates registered strong performances in the party’s first elections at the subnational level. Despite a slew of disadvantages, the PRD won scores of mayoralties in 1989 and 1990. Absent fraud, the party would have won many additional mayoralties and might have won several governorship (e.g., Tabasco, San Luis Potosí). In view of these encouraging early results, PRD leaders and activists looked to the 1991 congressional elections with optimism. Despite a highly uneven electoral playing field, ‘leaders and activists shared...a certainty’ that the party would win ‘broad representation’ in the Mexican Congress (Borjas 2003: 388). A strong performance in the election, they believed, would enable the PRD legislative bloc to stymie the Salinas agenda, pass institutional reforms leveling the electoral playing field, and thus lay the groundwork for a Cárdenas victory in 1994. This optimism ‘represented the...point of convergence within the party organization’ (Borjas 2003: 288).

The PRD performed abysmally. The party lost seats\textsuperscript{150} and finished a distant third, with a mere eight percent of the vote. The PAN maintained a vote share of eighteen percent, while the PRI jumped from fifty-one to sixty-one percent.\textsuperscript{151} Taken together, the constituent party’s of the former FDN increased their vote share and defeated the PRD. The PRD also failed to elect a governor for the third consecutive year. The PRI won all seven 1991 gubernatorial elections (Campeche, Colima, Guanajuato, Nuevo León, Querétaro, San Luis Potosí, and Sonora), although it ceded the governorship of Guanajuato to the PAN in response to anti-fraud protests.

The 1991 results dashed perredistas’ expectations and threatened the party’s survival. Prominent PRD leaders from the social left, citing PRI abuses, manipulations, and violence during the campaigns, advocated that the PRD completely withdraw from the electoral sphere. In an early 2000s interview, Cárdenas described 1991 as the most challenging episode in the PRD’s history: ‘The objective of the ’91 midterms was the real, effective liquidation of the PRD... [T]his was the PRD’s hardest electoral moment’ [152] Less than a month after the election, Porfirio Muñoz Ledo publicly stated that the PRD’s continued electoral significance might hinge on an alliance with the conservative PAN – an unthinkable prospect for much of the PRD rank-and-file [153] Bruhn (1998) writes that the PRD’s ‘dismal performance [in 1991]... damaged its credibility as a threat to the PRI...and led many to question its very survival’ (250). Borjas (2003) states that after the election, ‘it was completely undeniable that the survival of the PRD...was in danger’ (457-8) [154]

After the election, party leaders, despite their concerns about the party’s viability, exhorted the base to regroup. Leaders urged militantes, in particular, to redirect their attention toward upcoming subnational contests, municipal and state. In its internal diagnosis, the National Executive Council emphasized that the PRD continued to suffer from ‘great shortcomings’ in the organizational domain and resolved, moving forward, to prioritize territorial expansion from the regional to precinct level, and to identify areas of infrastructural weakness with ‘X-ray’ precision [155] Cárdenas himself proposed a ‘major organizational effort’, and Muñoz Ledo concurred, proposing that the party expand its territorial reach, in electoral and organizational terms, by forging broader alliances [156]

Independently of top-down exhortations, however, the 1991 crisis actually galvanized much of [154] The party, Borjas (2003) observes, ‘suffered a severe setback (retroceso) not only in relation to the seats obtained by the constituent parties of the FDN, but even relative to itself, given that it did not manage to hold the fifty-five seats obtained by the FDN members who had become perredistas’ (408).

the PRD base. As described by the editors of the PRD’s twenty-year commemorative: ‘1991 represented for the PRD its first political setback but at the same time the consolidation of an iron-willed base (militancia férrea)’ (González et al., eds., 2010: 66). Early perredistas viewed the PRI’s overwhelming victory in 1991 as illegitimate: the product of repression, massive state spending, a corrupt media establishment, and fraud. By and large, these activists opted to continue the struggle.

One party founder and activist, recalling the mentality at the base level after the 1991 election, emphasized that the PRD was ‘at war’. The PRI had murdered scores of activists and, just as in 1988, defrauded the national electorate. The PRD had not actually lost. For these reasons, the interviewee stated, the elections did not depress early activists’ ‘ánimo’ (spirits). 157 Another founder and early federal deputy with social left origins expressed a similar sentiment. The elections, he stated, were not a huge disappointment because there had not been real competition. Priístas had used every conceivable lever of state to win. They had cheated and used the state apparatus and media. Local chiefs with impunity had killed activists ‘just for defending the vote’. PRI hostility motivated the militancia. PRD activists did not even entertain the thought of giving up after 1991. They ‘had to’ get organized, as there was no other way to defeat the PRI. 158

The PRD survived the electoral crisis of 1991 due to the persistence of activist networks in the party’s territorial redoubts. In the gubernatorial elections of 1992 and 1993, the PRD’s first major post-1991 contests, the PRD, despite failing to win a single governorship, registered strong performance in numerous states. In particular, PRD candidates performed well above the party average in organizational strongholds such as Michoacán, Guerrero, Nayarit, Veracruz, and Zacatecas (Borjas 2003: 490-1). The PRD also advanced at the state-legislative level in most territorial strongholds.

In 1992 and 1993, the PRD’s top leadership gave public voice to the confrontational, defiant attitude that predominated among local party activists. In mid-1992, Muñoz Ledo stated in Proceso: ‘What irritates Salinas is the PRD’s position... the attitude of democratic intransigence... It bothers him that we’re incorruptible. That’s what pains him the most. What most irritates him is that we can’t be bought, and don’t even feel afraid, to such a degree that we go looking for fear recklessly’\footnote{Proceso no. 820, 8/30/1992.} Along similar lines, Cárdenas stated in 1993 that Salinas ‘must be annoyed...because he has not been able, with all the state’s resources, to crush the PRD or its leaders’\footnote{Proceso no. 820, 8/30/1992.}

The 1994 presidential election

The PRD survived the 1991 congressional election due to organizational strength and activist commitment. Local networks of base-level perredistas regrouped and continued their party work, expanding the grassroots organization and campaigning for subnational PRD candidates. In the 1994 presidential election, however, the PRD suffered another electoral crisis, testing the PRD’s durability a second time.

In a sense, Cárdenas’s landslide loss in 1994 posed a more significant challenge to the PRD than the 1991 electoral crisis. The prospect of a Cárdenas victory – and, with it, the completion of Mexico’s transition to democracy and an historic victory for the Mexican left – had animated perredistas since the party’s founding. CEN member Jesús Ortega wrote in Proceso in August of 1995 that the PRD had possessed only one objective until that point: to elect Cárdenas president the previous year\footnote{Proceso, no. 980, August 14, 1995, pp. 12-5. Cited in Borjas (2003): 69.} According to Martínez (2005), ‘the PRD was conceived around one person and one idea: to carry Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas to the presidency’ (97). Borjas (2003) writes that ‘rescuing’, or ‘recovering’, the presidency for Cárdenas constituted the PRD’s ‘central short-term objective’ as of 1993 and, more generally, ‘one of the main ideas...guid[ing] the actions of the PRD’ in its initial years (456, 507). Rodríguez (n.d.) describes the goal to win the 1994 presidential election – to ‘take back what they stole from us in 1988’ (257) – as the early PRD’s central reason for existence. Throughout the early 1990s, numerous perredistas did not believe that the PRD would survive if Cárdenas lost in 1994.

Further, according to pre-election conventional wisdom within the PRD, Cárdenas would prevail if the party’s ground forces, unlike in 1988, did a thorough job of defending the vote. The PRD’s 2010 hardback commemorative recalls the atmosphere at the II National Congress in mid-1993: ‘The spirit of the second congress was different from 1990. It was of resistance, of electoral strength reduced to eight percent, but with a militancia convinced that it would win 1994’. Borjas (2003) writes that PRD leaders and militantes were ‘sure that in 1994, circumstances would be different’ (507).

But Cárdenas lost in a landslide. He placed a distant third with seventeen percent of the vote. That Cárdenas not only lost, but received under one-fifth of the valid votes, damaged the party’s credibility and self-conception as a serious challenger to the PRI. Party moderates argued that the PRD lost, fundamentally, because the Cárdenas campaign had espoused radical views, which alienated moderate left voters, and relied on antiquated campaign tactics such as rallies, which limited Cárdenas’s exposure (Greene 2007). Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, for example, criticized the Cárdenas campaign’s programmatic decisions, especially to support the Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN) and oppose the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). Cárdenas himself highlighted the campaign’s overreliance on rallies (mitines) and underutilization of more modern, efficient forms of campaigning such as mass media appeals.

To be sure, Cárdenas’s loss deflated hopes and led to anger, disillusionment, and recriminations. As in 1991, however, the PRD militancia – more radical, by and large, than the party moderates who criticized the Cárdenas campaign – remained unfazed. Local PRD activists viewed Cárdenas’s crushing defeat as part of a long pattern of illegitimate electoral outcomes, based on media ostracism and hostility, massive resource asymmetries, activist repression, and (rightly or wrongly) fraud. The PRI’s hostility and perceived abuse of power thus remained a galvanizing force. During a discussion of the 1994 election, one party founder stated that the playing field remained highly uneven, and the PRD remained at ‘war’. Perredistas, he stated, owed it to their fallen comrades to soldier on and eventually defeat the PRI.

As had occurred in 1991, PRD activist networks in the party’s territorial strongholds, following Cárdenas’s 1994 defeat, redirected their attention and energies toward subnational elections, both for electoral mobilization and (in Tabasco) post-electoral civil resistance. As noted earlier, the year 1995 gave rise to the second and more heavily publicized ‘exodus for democracy’, in which AMLO led a march from Tabasco to Mexico City in protest of both state and national fraud. In territorial strongholds, the PRD performed well above the party average in 1995 and 1996 state and local elections, including the 1995 gubernatorial race in Michoacán, the 1995 and 1996 state legislative contests in Oaxaca and Guerrero, and the 1995 and 1996 municipal elections Chiapas, Michoacán, Oaxaca, Mexico state, Guerrero, Hidalgo, and Nayarit.\textsuperscript{171}

Thus, as with the electoral setback in 1991, after the 1994 presidential election, PRD activist networks in the party’s territorial redoubts regrouped and shifted focus to subnational contests. Asked to explain the PRD’s resilience after the 1994 election, a party scholar based in Mexico stressed the importance of the PRD militancia. Loyal networks of activists, he stated, never accounted for most PRD votes, but by remaining committed and active through disappointing times, they gave the PRD a sturdy electoral floor and enabled the party to overcome crises like Cárdenas’s 1994 loss.\textsuperscript{172}

During the second half of the 1990s, the PRD began to engage aggressively in top-down – and more mercenary – forms of organization-building. This initiative formed part of a broader strategy to improve the PRD’s future performance in major elections. Under the party presidency of AMLO (1996-9), the National Executive Committee (CEN) made a series of tactical compromises to position the PRD for victory in the 1997 Federal District mayoral election, a slew of late 1990s gubernatorial elections, and the 2000 presidential election. Controversial among PRD purists, these compromises included major new mass media initiatives and, in the domain of organizational expansion, the large-scale use of paid activists and the frequent co-optation of external candidates and activist networks.

AMLO’s media strategy arose in part from the 1996 political reforms and the opening of private media in the late 1990s, but also from the recognition that ground organization and rallies alone did not deliver major executive victories. Cárdenas’s 1994 defeat raised awareness within the PRD leadership that, at least in major national elections, traditional party organization and campaign events could not substitute for media. Citing the impact of regime capacity and ‘media attacks’, one party leader stated in Proceso: ‘We thought that just with rallies we were overcoming the actions of the [government] apparatus in the electoral process’ [173] As party president, AMLO impressed upon the PRD that success in the largest elections would require a greater willingness and ability to use mass media. His internal administration thus poured campaign resources into media advertisements.

Simultaneously, however, the PRD retained its organizational ethos and sought to continue its organizational expansion even as it embraced media. In particular, AMLO sought to beef up the PRD’s electoral infrastructure in historically problematic localities and regions, where base-level party networks still had not sprouted up. By the mid-1990s, the PRD claimed over one million members and formal branches in most of the nation’s municipalities, but this left much of the country untouched. In most Mexican states, the PRD lacked professional cuadros capable of governing at the state level or ground organizations large enough to drive successful gubernatorial campaigns. Aided by the influx of public funding in 1997, AMLO’s CEN financed the creation and development of the Brigadas del Sol (Sun Brigades), a large army of new militantes activated for electoral campaigns and remunerated for their services, in contrast to the PRD’s initial activist cohort. The PRD allocated thirty percent of the 1997 campaign fund to the Brigadas. By the end of the year, the Brigadas included 63,000 paid activists, one for every electoral precinct in Mexico (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 124-5).

fourth National Congress in March of that year: ‘The road that the PRD must travel in the coming months and years is not easy. The party must keep building, developing, and consolidating itself across the country; creating new base-level and municipal committees’.

In order to increase the PRD’s territorial implantation in organizational and electoral terms, AMLO initiated the practice, in states with a weak PRD presence, of incorporating external candidates, often defecting pri´ıstas, with their own local and regional networks and machines. In 1998, gubernatorial elections took place in nine states: four in the North (Chihuahua, Durango, Sinaloa, Tamaulipas), two in the Central region (Aguascalientes, Zacatecas), two in the East (Puebla, Tlaxcala), and one in the South (Oaxaca). In eight of the nine states, the PRD fielded external candidates. Five of the PRD’s external gubernatorial candidates defected from the PRI to run on PRD tickets.

AMLO’s electoralist tactics provoked heated internal criticism, nationally and subnationally, from PRD leaders and activists of radical and social left origin. These leaders rejected the use of selective incentives to fuel activism and the co-optation of external candidates, especially ex-pri´ıstas with little or no connection to Cárdenas’s original Corriente Democrática. Yet the tactics paid dividends, both organizationally and electorally. It was under AMLO’s party presidency that the PRD won its first major executive victories: the 1997 DF mayoralty and three governorships in 1998-9. All three successful gubernatorial candidates were external and ex-PRI: Ricardo Monreal in Zacatecas, Alfonso Sánchez in Tlaxcala, and Leonel Cota in Baja California del Sur. In Zacatecas, the PRD, prior to inheriting Monreal’s regional machine, claimed offices in only twenty-one of the state’s fifty-seven municipalities. Monreal brought an ‘extensive network of loyalties’ with him, helping bolster the state PRD organization (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 211). As of 1998, the PRD claimed two-million members, six-thousand comités de base, full municipal office penetration percent in the Federal District.

and six Mexican states, over 85-percent penetration in thirteen states, and nearly 64-percent penetration nationally.\textsuperscript{175}

Avoiding schism in the early PRD: the indispensability of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas

Adverse circumstances led to the emergence of a strong PRD organization composed of committed activists. While critical for the PRD’s survival of early electoral crisis, organizational strength and activist commitment also brought risks of fragmentation and schism, for two reasons. First, as suggested earlier, the early PRD’s committed activists and leaders, for the most part, were ideologues, not pragmatists (Greene 2007). Although ideology extends individuals’ time horizons and thus strengthens member loyalty amid crisis, ideologues are also more likely than pragmatists to value ideological and programmatic purity over electoral success. Many ideological parties and political movements – even relatively narrow, homogeneous ones – suffer from low cohesion and bitter divisions (e.g., Latin American communist parties). In the early PRD, the strong presence of ideologues, other things equal, militated against compromise and contributed to sectarianism and factional conflict.

Second, the PRD was far from homogeneous. It is almost never feasible to build a strong party organization without incorporating a highly heterogeneous set of individuals and organizations. The PRD, in order to establish party nuclei and branches in large swaths of the national territory, had to allow for considerable internal difference, and not just in ideological terms. In a single umbrella party, or partido-escoba\(^\text{176}\) the early PRD brought together social movements, civil society organizations, regional PRI structures, traditional Marxist structures, and several small political parties. Although these groups shared the objective of electing Cárdenas and, in the process, democratizing Mexico and halting the country’s neoliberal turn, they differed in their long-term ideological visions, short-term programmatic and tactical preferences and priorities, class makeups, regional profiles, organizational subcultures, and personal loyalties.

\(^{176}\text{Borjas (2003) uses this term (258).}\)
Within the traditional Marxist left alone, one of just three central PRD feeder categories, all of the above differences existed. The constituent parties of the PMS, overwhelmingly the PRD’s main source of traditional Marxist elites, cuadros, and organizational structures, spanned the full range of Marxist currents, possessed their own partisan cultures, and professed loyalty to competing leaders. The PMS succeeded the PSUM, itself an almost intractably heterogeneous Marxist coalition. The declaration of principles of the PSUM had ‘reflected an almost impossible amalgamation of ideologies’. ‘In a single party’, the ‘communist, socialist, lombardista[T]rotskyist, liberal, and revolutionary nationalist [lefts]’ had come together (Hernández 2010: 34). In addition to absorbing the PSUM, the PMS, as discussed earlier, incorporated six separate Marxist parties and organizations, some firmly institutionalist and reformist (e.g., Jesús Ortega’s defecting PST faction), others less so (e.g., PPR, MRP). During its short existence, the PMS lacked a ‘common identity to erase the loyalties of members of its component parties’ (Bruhn 1998: 163).

Thus, the traditional Marxist left, just one of the PRD’s three major feeder categories, lacked cohesion. Moreover, the central point of convergence within this PRD feeder category – established participation in democratic institutional politics – set it apart from a second major PRD feeder category: the extraparliamentary social left. Gradualist rather than revolutionary, the constituent parties of the PMS, for decades, had embraced electoral competition as the primary means for advancing left ideals and interests. In contrast, the PRD’s feeder movements, organizations and parties from the social left, prior to 1988, had either disdained democratic politics or simply not participated. These actors embraced tactics of mobilization and, for the most part, categorically rejected negotiation and dialogue with the PRI.

177 After Mexican labor leader Vicente Lombardo Toledano (1894-1968).

178 The entry of groups such as the PPR and MRP marked a hitherto rare fusion of social and traditional left forces. Predictably, leaders of the PPR and MRP ‘revived an argument that the [PMS] had supposedly overcome: the commitment to legality’ (Martínez 2005: 92). See also Rodríguez (n.d.): 258.
Despite sharing an extraparliamentary orientation, groups on the social left differed widely along dimensions of region, class, and ideology. As noted earlier, they included ex-guerrilla nuclei, rural unions, popular urban movements, teachers’ unions, blue-collar unions, student associations, NGOs, and post-materialist organizations. Some were anarchist, others nationalist. Most were Marxist but, within Marxism, differed in sectarian orientation, ranging from Trotskyist, Maoist, and Guevarist to revolutionary Christian (Martínez 2005: 53).

The third major feeder category of the PRD, the Corriente Democrática (CD), contained ideological divisions at the elite level and distinct leadership loyalties at the base level. At the elite level, CD leaders divided into two camps: those centrally concerned with mass mobilization and confrontation (e.g., Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas), and those focused on reform through institutional politics (e.g., Porfirio Muñoz Ledo). This difference mirrored that between the confrontational, movimientista social left and the predominantly reformist, institutionalist PMS. At the base level, the PRD’s two strongest ex-PRI feeder networks, in Michoacán and Tabasco, supported different leaders, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas and Andrés Manuel López Obrador. For the individuals within these organized bases, loyalty to the relevant leader (Cárdenas, AMLO) trumped commitment to the broader array of forces in the PRD.

Prior to the PRD’s creation, horizontal linkages, both within and across PRD feeder categories, were often superficial or nonexistent. Where relations ran deep, they were typically characterized by high levels of conflict and low levels of routinization. Ties between defecting PRI networks, for example, barely existed. Regional ex-PRI networks in Michoacán, Tabasco, and Mexico City, prior to the PRD’s creation, shared a party label but had existed independently, with little interaction, for decades. The sprawling social left, having eschewed elections during the 1970s and 1980s, never had an incentive to unify at the national level before the PRD’s founding. Thus, social left movements and organizations possessed little or no experience of negotiating, bargaining, and resolving conflicts with each other under the umbrella of large national coalition movements and organizations.

In particular regions, social left groups often did possess ties that predated the FDN and PRD. In most cases, however, these ties had given way to bitter sectarian division by the PRD’s founding. The social left in the state of Guerrero, a major bastion of the early PRD, provides a case in point. In the 1960s and 1970s, Guerrero constituted the primary battleground of the dirty war between Mexico’s rural guerrilla insurgency and the state, and during this time, numerous guerrilla groups and sympathetic left organizations pooled resources and joined forces. After the guerrillas’ decisive defeat in the 1970s, however, alliances frayed, and Guerrero’s social left fragmented into a multitude of conflicting sects with their own leaders, strategies, and local and sectoral strongholds (Fernández 1993).

Although the traditional Marxist left did, through the creation of the PSUM and PMS, make a modicum of progress toward unification before the PRD’s founding, horizontal relations within the traditional Marxist left remained conflictual and weakly routinized at the base and elite levels. Excluded from the unification process, activists and members in the PMS’s feeder parties did not have time ‘to redefine their models of activism and organization in a democratic manner’ (Rodríguez 2010: 258). At the elite level, informal negotiations rather than formal procedures determined the allocation of candidacies and internal positions (Bruhn 1998: 163). Until the PRD’s creation, the PMS remained a ‘hostage of its internal divisions. Heterogeneity...blocked cohesion’ (Martínez 2005: 92). Prud’homme (1997) summarizes: ‘As a party, the PMS never managed to become institutionalized: the most disciplined cuadros of the PSUM and PMT coexisted with a multiplicity of leaders from the small, radical left organizations’ (12).

Finally, linkages across the PRD’s three broad feeder categories were also weak or nonexistent. Historically separated by distance and ideas, the CD-aligned dissident PRI, traditional Marxist left, and social left, before Cárdenas’s presidential bid, had not joined in collective movements or organizations. The year 1988 marked the first major confluence of these categories.

In sum, the early PRD, in absorbing most of Mexico’s traditional Marxist left, most of its social left, and multiple regional PRI structures, inherited a geographically dispersed and highly heterogeneous set of movements, organizations, and partisan networks characterized by superficial or nonexistent horizontal relations or, where relations ran deeper, high levels of sectarianism and conflict and weakly routinized collective decision-making procedures. Of necessity, the PRD, on creation, inherited all of these characteristics.

Barriers to unity in the early PRD

Much like Brazil’s PT and Peru’s IU, the PRD, from its founding statutes, was a party of factions, not with factions. Founding statutes structured the PRD organization as a presidential system mediated by corrientes, formally recognized factions often described as the PRD’s ‘parties’ or, in informal parlance, tribus (tribes). Throughout the PRD’s formative years, in order to receive candidacies or ascend in the national or subnational party apparatus, one had to belong to or ally with a corriente. In large measure, corrientes received primacy in the early PRD because of the party’s PRI origins, and because well-organized groups within the PRD, especially from the PMS and CD, wished to place a check on Cárdenas’s internal power (Martínez 2005: 101).

Except during national Congresses, power within the PRD resided in the National Executive Committee (CEN) and the larger National Council (CN). The president of the party was the chief executive and head of the CEN. The CEN consisted of numerous secretarías, the equivalent of PRD ‘ministries’. The formal structure of state and municipal party organs paralleled that of the national organization. Power at these levels resided in state and municipal executive committees and councils. National Congresses, convoked as necessary, were the PRD’s supreme authority and consisted of delegates selected, through varying mechanisms, by subnational organs.

Given the level of heterogeneity within each feeder category of the PRD, the early PRD organization was extremely heterogeneous, with ‘many leaders, partisan and organizational cultures, and networks of personal loyalty coexist[ing]’ (Prud’homme 1997: 12). Martínez (2005) describes the early PRD as ‘an explosive cocktail that mixe[d] communists and Trotskyists, ex-príistas and ex-guerrillas, nationalists and internationalists’ (59). 179

In broad terms, the internal functioning of the PRD’s early municipal organs, state organs, and national secretarías (PRD ministries) varied depending on which leader/s, backed by which PRD feeder organization/s, controlled them. The result was multi-layered organizational heterogeneity, from municipal organ to municipal organ, from state organ to state organ, and from national secretaría to national secretaría. Reflecting a ‘precarious union’, 180 these organs and agencies possessed weak or nonexistent horizontal linkages, a fact emphasized in Borjas (2003) and Rodríguez (n.d.).

Within individual party organs, especially the national and top subnational executive committees and councils, conflict and division ran rampant between leaders and between corrientes. Global ideological conditions fixed the boundaries of this internal conflict and division. The PRD was founded the same year that the Berlin Wall fell. The collapse of the Soviet Union undermined Marxism as a global ideology and, consequently, shaped the ideological struggle within the PRD. Debates did not center on grand questions of capitalism versus communism. Leaders and corrientes did differ, however, on fundamental questions of program, 179 The ‘diversity of the groups and organizations that supported Cárdenas (and the left in general)’, writes Bruhn (1998), ‘made profound internal divisions very likely’ (165).

180 Borjas (2003) writes that due to the diversity of PRD feeder groups, ‘high heterogeneity and a precarious union’ obtained between secretarías, between state committees, and between municipal committees (450; see also 301, 518).
internal procedure, and above all, the proper tactics and timeline for democratizing Mexico and rolling back neoliberalism. At the national and subnational levels, leaders competed for coveted candidacies and control of the internal apparatus, both for personal gain and to advance factional agendas. From these struggles, clear winners and losers emerged.

Early state PRD organs, for example, often became terrains of bitter sectarian conflict between dizzying arrays of left forces. In Guerrero, for example, seven distinct early ‘PRD projects’ emerged, dominated by moderate leaders in some cases (Zenón Santibáñez, Eloy Cisneros) and radical leaders in others (e.g., Félix Salgado, Rosalío Wences), and characterized in every case by different combinations of social and traditional left actors including ex-guerrilla groups, peasant unions, teachers’ unions, and university networks linked to the powerful Autonomous University of Guerrero. Although these ‘PRD projects’ operated under the PRD label, the party label ‘hid’ the competing ‘strategic projects’ that had ‘pulverized the left in the 1970s and 1980s’, as well as ‘all the accumulated resentments’ of that period (Fernández 1993). Similar internal divisions obtained at the state level in the PRD’s other early bastions, including Chiapas, Mexico state, Michoacán, Tabasco, 181 Javier Hidalgo emphasized this point in an interview with the author.

182 Unlike in Michoacán and Tabasco, in Guerrero, defecting PRI networks played a very marginal role in building the PRD (Fernández 1993).
183 Fernández (1993) observes that, given the weakness of Guerrero’s economic sector, Catholic Church, national political class, and party system, the UAG played a major role in mediating relations between the state government and population.
184 The seven ‘PRD projects’ identified by Fernández (1993) had the following leaders: Orthón Salazar, teachers’ union leader and ex-PCM member, in the Montaña region; Félix Salgado, radical, former PFCRN member, and early FDN/PRD deputy and senator, in the North region; Zenón Santibáñez, moderate dialoguista, former PFCRN member, and bitter rival of Félix Salgado, in the Tierra Caliente region; Eloy Cisneros, ex-guerrilla with ties to the Autonomous University of Guerrero, in the Costa Chica region; different alliances of ex-guerrilla and universitarios in the Costa Grande and Acapulco regions; and Rosalío Wences, former PCM member, rector of the strategically important Autonomous University of Guerrero (1972-90), and arguably Guerrero’s most important PRD leader in the early 1990s, in the Central region. Wences chose not to run for governor of Guerrero in 1994, preferring to run for rector a fourth time (Fernández 1993).
At the national level, however, the PRD’s internal struggles received their fullest expression. The national leadership and associated corrientes represented all of the PRD’s major points of view and all three of its feeder categories (the former PRI, the traditional Marxist left, and the social left), along with each category’s internal contradictions.

Moreover, internal conflict resolution and decision-making were weakly routinized. Perhaps no single fact illustrates this more clearly than the frequency of national Congresses. In order to change core party statutes and address various forms of internal dysfunction, the PRD convoked six congresses in the first twelve years of its existence. Brazil’s PT, in contrast, held only one Congress in its first twelve years.

Subnational organs typically followed their own rules. In Borjas’s (2003) words, ‘state and municipal committees functioned according to who led them and not based on established norms and procedures’ (519). Decision-making practices and outcomes in the critical areas of programmatic development, candidate selection, delegate selection, the distribution of internal positions, membership criteria, and activist formation varied from one subnational organ to the next. Where national party statutes dictated to subnational organs in these areas, subnational organs often flouted the relevant statutes, almost always without consequence. The national party also exercised little control over subnational politicians and national legislators, who rarely received serious sanctions if they deviated from the formal or informal party line.

More importantly, within the National Executive Committee and Council, the PRD, during its formative years, never consolidated formal procedures for resolving the most critical conflicts between leaders and corrientes. As of the mid-1990s, the national leadership had still failed to reach agreement on a common national party program\textsuperscript{187} Throughout the 1990s, the PRD did not have stable formal procedures for selecting candidates, for selecting its own president, or for distributing positions within the party apparatus. Typically, the national party leadership depended on informal negotiations to distribute candidacies and internal posts. When the leadership adhered to formal procedures, elites often determined the specific procedure through informal negotiation and on a case-by-case basis\textsuperscript{188} National leaders regularly flouted the formal rules of internal competition, such as the ban on running in consecutive PRD presidential elections.

Moreover, procedures intended for long-term use rarely endured more than a few years. The party’s procedure for electing its own president, for example, changed over the course of the 1990s, beginning as a congressional vote and shifting to a closed primary\textsuperscript{189} Procedures for determining the composition of the CEN and distribution of candidacies also changed repeatedly. Initially, the party president personally appointed all secretarías in the CEN. In 1993, the party instituted a formal proportional representation system. This planilla system was later abolished at the party’s sixth Congress in 2000\textsuperscript{190}

Finally, disloyal opposition, low levels of trust, and perceptions of illegitimacy almost routinely marred the use of the PRD’s collective decision-making institutions. In particular, throughout the second half of the 1990s, PRD elites who competed with each other via closed primaries for major candidacies and top internal leadership positions repeatedly alleged fraud and refused to recognize the results. The early PRD’s internal dysfunction, \textsuperscript{187}This was one stated reason why Jorge Alcocer (PCM/PSUM/PMS) defected from the PRD in late 1990.

\textsuperscript{188}Party elites agreed, for example, to hold a closed primary to determine the candidate for the 1997 Federal District mayoral election.
\textsuperscript{189}The party’s first two presidents were elected by the first and second Congresses. Subsequently, the PRD membership voted for party president in closed primaries, independently of party congresses.
\textsuperscript{190}The number of secretarías also changed numerous times over the course of the 1990s.
frequently publicized in mass media, damaged the party’s image among the broader electorate. Internal and external critics argued that the PRD, by modeling democracy so poorly internally, disqualified itself as a governing alternative and force for democracy in Mexico. A document approved at the sixth Congress in 2001, for example, partially attributed the crushing defeat of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas and the PRD in 2000 to a public loss of confidence in the PRD following the disorderly 1999 internal presidential election (about which more below).

Despite all of the above, the early PRD averted the worst. High levels of heterogeneity, weak horizontal linkages, fierce and constant internal battles over ideas and cuotas de poder, and weakly routinized procedures for resolving conflicts did not give rise to serious fragmentation or fatal schisms. What factor/s enabled the early PRD to avoid fragmentation and schism?

The indispensability of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas

As Chapter One argues, two general factors decrease the likelihood of debilitating schisms, especially in large, heterogeneous parties with weak horizontal linkages and major divisions: (1) a strong electoral incentive for elites and factions to remain in the party, and (2) a mechanism for balancing internal interests and adjudicating internal conflicts. For almost all established political parties, the party label, or brand, provides the first. Many established parties, over time, institutionalize a set of procedures for adjudicating internal affairs, which provides the second.

For the most part, new parties lack successful brands and institutionalized conflict resolution procedures. The early PRD was no exception. During its first decade, the party was still attempting to establish a solid and far-reaching partisan brand in the electorate. It was also attempting – and, as shown above, failing – to institutionalize procedures for the balancing of diverse interests and the adjudication of disputes.

Throughout the late 1980s and 1990s, party leader Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas substituted for a strong brand and also for a set of institutionalized conflict resolution procedures. Although the PRD was beset by internal conflicts over political tactics, cuotas de poder, and program during the formative phase, the Cárdenas brand provided a strong electoral incentive against lower elite defection. Equally, through active brokerage and arbitration, rooted in unquestioned internal authority, Cárdenas balanced internal interests, resolved conflicts, and enabled the party to act in a minimally unified manner. In these ways, Cárdenas played a critical role in preventing fragmentation and schism within the early PRD.

Cárdenas’s brand and coattails

Not just any leader could have substituted for a strong left party brand in Mexico during the late 1980s. Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, however, possessed tremendous, unrivaled electoral clout. One Mexico City-based journalist and political activist deftly observed that in contrast to the early PRD, which lacked access to electronic media and could not build support quickly, Cárdenas, from the beginning, did not need the media, or even a campaign. He ‘communicated just in virtue of existing’. With a name like Cárdenas, ‘the campaign was carried out every day in school’.

The genesis of the FDN and PRD demonstrated the fundamental importance of Cárdenas’s electoral clout for left unity. Despite its extraparliamentary origins, the PRD required an ‘electoral sphere...to become consolidated as a political force’ (7, emphasis added). The

In the 1988 election, Cárdenas showed that he could win. In fact, his performance suggested that in 1994, with a stronger organization and improved defend-the-vote operation, he would win. No other left leader could credibly offer the possibility of national power. As evidenced by his 1988 campaign and performance, Cárdenas’s personal electoral brand eclipsed that of all previous left parties and leaders. These facts cemented PMS and broader left support and provided the central impetus for the creation of the PRD.

During the PRD’s formative years, the PRD continued to ‘[depend] heavily on...Cárdenas to draw together diverse political allies’ (Bruhn 1998: 190). In early 1991, Arnoldo Martínez Verdugo (PMS) stated that ‘there is a man whose level surpasses the PRD, who is a national leader... That is Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas’. In October of 1993, Heberto Castillo stated that ‘there is no other citizen in the country with greater potential to unite currents around him than Cuauhtémoc’. Lower elites thus defected at their own electoral peril. Rodríguez (n.d.) argues that even if Cárdenas had attempted to institutionalize his dominance within the early PRD by establishing a formal cardenista faction, a schism would not have resulted because ‘there were few external incentives for the party’s intermediate leaders to split’ (257).

Coming out of the 1994 election, which he lost in a landslide, Cárdenas did not have the same proven external clout as after 1988. Yet the impact of this election on perredistas’ perceptions of Cárdenas’s external clout should not be overstated. To begin, although Cárdenas suffered a crushing defeat, many PRD leaders and most of the base attributed his loss, primarily, to PRI spending and media manipulation, not to his weaknesses as a candidate. Moreover, Cárdenas resurged in 1997, winning the first ever election for mayor of the Federal District in a landslide. In the view of nearly all perredistas, no other left leader stood a comparable chance of winning the 2000 presidential election. More than that, most believed Cárdenas stood a good chance of winning. Given his performance in the 1997 DF election and the PRD’s subsequent gubernatorial victories, ‘the Party of the Democratic Revolution approached the 2000 presidential elections with optimism’ (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 238).

In sum, during the PRD’s formative years, Cárdenas delivered the votes. The PRD brand, by and large, did not. To quote Borjas (2003), ‘the charismatic leader and not the PRD was the receiver of the votes... The incorporation of citizens, organizations, and social movements resulted from his mobilizing capacity and not from a party program...’ (507-8). Cárdenas both ‘was the PRD’ and ‘was more than the party, since his leadership was recognized by citizens and non-activist groups willing to back him. In synthesis: the PRD was Cárdenas, but, surpassed by him, without his presence it was nothing’ (508).

It should also be emphasized that as the 1990s unfolded, the PRD brand, as distinct from the Cárdenas brand, strengthened considerably. Surveys indicate that by 2000, most Mexicans could locate the PRD on the left-right spectrum.\footnote{199} Whereas in the 1991 Chamber election, with Cárdenas off the ballot, the PRD had received only eight percent of the vote, in the 2003 Chamber election, the PRD’s first election with Cárdenas off the ballot since 1991\footnote{200} the party received eighteen percent of the vote. Thus, as Cárdenas’s brand weakened over the course of the 1990s, the PRD brand strengthened, creating an offsetting electoral incentive against elite defection.

Cárdenas’s unquestioned internal authority

In addition to substituting for a strong party brand, Cárdenas substituted for internal decision-making procedures by acting as the PRD’s key decider and, in the event of conflict, its informal high court, or arbiter of last resort. Cárdenas’s ability to assume these functions flowed from his unquestioned internal authority, rooted in a combination of factors: unmatched external appeal, which gave Cárdenas leverage over potential elite competitors, but also (1) high moral stature within the party, especially the base, and (2) a singular position, established very early, at the hub of the PRD’s sprawling, heterogeneous, and fragmented vertical and horizontal networks.

Cárdenas’s internal moral stature

Cárdenas’s mística and moral stature within the PRD stemmed from several factors: his lineage, but also his political record and experiences prior to the PRD’s creation and his intransigent opposition to the PRI throughout the PRD’s formative phase. Although Cárdenas’s lineage elevated him in the eyes of the broad electorate, as emphasized earlier, it especially \footnote{199} Citation needed.

\footnote{200} In 1994 and 2000, Cárdenas ran for president, and in 1997, he ran for the Federal District mayoralty.
raised his stature within the left. ‘Cárdenas’ was the last name ‘most respected by the political left’ (Borjas 2003: 293). In the formulation of one Mexico-based political scientist, General Cárdenas symbolized the aspirations of the Mexican left, and the Mexican left associated Cárdenas the son with his father. Cárdenas’s lineage endowed him with an almost mystical quality for much of the PRD base. Among perredistas, Cárdenas symbolized the party’s highest aspirations. The party and its moral leader were inextricably linked. PRD activists and supporters attributed to Cárdenas, more than to any other party leader, the authentic commitment and will necessary to bring about democratic change in Mexico.

Cárdenas’s actions and experiences during the 1980s helped solidify his stature. As governor of Michoacán (1980-6), he opposed and defied the neoliberal reforms of the de la Madrid government. More importantly, in 1988, according to nearly all Mexican leftists and left supporters at the time, Cárdenas unofficially defeated Salinas, sent the long-hegemonic PRI into an unprecedented internal crisis, and came close to toppling the regime. Subsequently, he refused to be purchased, rejecting Salinas de Gortari’s offer of the regency of Mexico City and insisting on democratic intransigence and sustained confrontation. Because of these actions, and because of his name, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, at the PRD’s founding, possessed unrivaled moral stature on the left. In the words of MUP leader Javier Hidalgo, Cárdenas had ‘the moral quality to be everyone’s leader’.

Cárdenas’s mística and moral stature carried the most weight at the base level. Cárdenas commanded the unconditional loyalty of most of the party rank-and-file, drawn primarily from the social left and the defecting PRI. Many of these base-level perredistas did not affiliate with a national corriente, did not hold office or paid party positions, and thus needed collective incentives ‘in order to remain connected to the PRD organization’ (Rodríguez n.d.:

201 Interview with Somuano.
202 Interview with Hidalgo.
Cárdenas possessed ‘an almost monopolistic capacity to produce collective goods’ for these groups and individuals (255).

During the PRD’s early development, Cárdenas shored up his support among the base by consistently prioritizing base-level demands, taking intransigent positions, and supporting the conception of the PRD as a movement, even at the expense of broader electoral appeal. ‘On finding receptivity to their demands and avenues to promote them, the social left within the PRD became an interest group willing to obey, in any moment, the directives of the charismatic leader’ (Borjas 2003: 303)

In short, just as the left-leaning electorate tended, during the late 1980s and early 1990s, to vote for Cárdenas rather than for the PRD, the early PRD rank-and-file was fundamentally loyal to Cárdenas rather than to the PRD. In Borjas’s (2003) formulation, during the PRD’s early years, ‘the loyalty of members was directed fundamentally toward Cárdenas’ and ‘only secondarily to the party itself’ (450-1). Many base-level perredistas identified the party with Cárdenas and considered the two inseparable.

Cárdenas’s diehard support from the base, to some degree, reflected a broader trend. In general, Cárdenas commanded the most steadfast support among the more intransigent, confrontational sectors of the party. Although disproportionately represented at the base level, these sectors of the party also existed at the elite level. From the beginning, Cárdenas established alliances with a range of social left leaders with origins on the extraparliamentary left. Journalist and intellectual Arnoldo Córdova thus wrote in late 1990 that ‘paradoxically’, ‘Cárdenas die-hards (incondicionales) come mainly from ultra-left groups’, not from the CD.

Internal alliances between Cárdenas and the radical PRD leadership would last 203 From the perspective of Panebianco and given the importance conferred to Cardenas by the perredista bases, Cardenas ‘arises as the creator and interpreter of a set of political symbols (the original ideological goals of the party) that come to be inseparable from his person” (Borjas 2003: 450-1).

throughout the formative phase, in part because of Cárdenas’s uncompromising stands as party leader.

Thus, Cárdenas commanded the unconditional loyalty of the PRD base and certain radical sectors of the national leadership. In addition, given that he combined unmatched external electoral clout with unmatched internal, base-level support, Cárdenas enjoyed immense leverage over lower elite competitors and opponents. This leverage took three forms. First, lower PRD elites knew that they received extra votes due to Cárdenas’s external appeal and coattails. Second, because Cárdenas commanded unrivaled loyalty among the PRD base, any lower elite who aspired to the party presidency, or needed broad internal support for some other reason, required Cárdenas’s backing regardless of whether s/he agreed with Cárdenas’s policies, tactics, and leadership style. In Borjas’s (2003) formulation, PRD members’ loyalty to lower elites and members had ‘an indirect character, given that [their loyalty] was fundamentally directed to [Cárdenas] and only in the second place to the party itself... The charismatic leader established himself as the source of other leaders’ legitimacy...’ (Borjas 2003: 450-1). Third, there was a broad recognition within the national PRD organization, among leaders of all stripes, that given the millions of external votes that Cárdenas delivered, and the countless individuals and organizations who joined and actively supported the PRD in primary allegiance to Cárdenas, PRD unity depended on Cárdenas.

Cárdenas used both his loyalties at the base and elite levels and his leverage at the elite level to establish himself as the hub of the complex PRD complex organization. More specifically, Cárdenas established strong crossfational ties both vertically (i.e., national to subnational) and horizontally (i.e., across national leaders and corrientes).

Cárdenas’s vertical crossfational ties

Cárdenas developed much stronger ties to the PRD’s subnational leaders/organs than any other national PRD elite. Not any leader could have achieved this, but Cárdenas, due to his intense, often die-hard support at the base level, established wide-ranging vertical ties with relative ease. Leaders and activists from the social left and ex-PRI networks controlled most local and regional PRD offices. By and large, these individuals were cardenistas first and perredistas only by extension. ‘Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas was the PRD, and the PRD was Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas. Consequently, organization and social movement leaders established personal, direct linkages with [Cárdenas]’, interfacing with the national party organization through him alone (Borjas 2003: 337). No other national leader claimed a remotely comparable network of subnational loyalties. The ‘tight links between Cárdenas and the PRD’s social left leaders meant that control...was shared and exercised almost completely by the group...headed by the charismatic leader’ (303). Subnational leaders across the PRD’s territorial bastions displayed a ‘willingness to cede [control] so that it could be assumed...by the charismatic leader...through bonds of loyalty established with him’ (450).

The weakness of horizontal linkages across subnational organs further strengthened Cárdenas’s position within the PRD organization. Most subnational organs engaged only in vertical communication, through Cárdenas, and did not form strong independent ties to each other. Rodríguez (n.d.) observes that Cárdenas’s ‘incontestable leadership became a node of organization between the different groups that...did not manage to organize horizontally’ (254, 263). Borjas (2003) similarly writes that the party’s ‘distinct subunits...more than interacting among themselves, established direct linkages with [Cárdenas]’ (448).

Many internal critics and external analysts have claimed that Cárdenas intentionally monopolized vertical communications and deliberately undermined horizontal linkages across subnational organs and feeder groups in order to prevent the creation of independent alliances and counterweights within the party organization, and hence to maximize his internal control. Rodríguez (n.d.) states that Cárdenas ‘reserved for himself negotiation with the local and regional chiefs, establishing a network of political alliances under his control’ (254; emphasis added). Borjas (2003) argues that Cárdenas ‘avoided the formation of horizontal linkages across leaders and across groups and guaranteed unconditional loyalties that permitted him to reinforce his control of the PRD’ (302-3).\footnote{See also Prud’homme (1997: ); Martínez (2005: ), Rodríguez (n.d.: ).}

Cárdenas’s strong ties across the PRD’s horizontally disconnected subnational organs gave him immense control in the critical zones of candidate selection, internal advancement and promotion, and programmatic and tactical development. Cárdenas used his vertical cross-factional ties to influence who entered the party, who ascended within the party apparatus, who received important candidacies, what information lower organs received, and more. In exchange for ‘loyalty and unconditional support’ from the movement and organization leaders who headed the PRD’s subnational organs, Cárdenas listened to and communicated their grievances (Borjas 2003: 298) and awarded them candidacies and party posts (Borjas 2003: 337).\footnote{The leaders of organizations and social movements established direct and personal links with the former presidential candidate and shared with him the role of executing the clientelistic exchanges within the organizations they represented. In this way, a complicated and solid network of relations arose within the PRD: social leaders gave loyalty and unconditional support to Cárdenas, and in exchange they received candidacies and party positions’ (Borjas 2003: 337).} Through his strong ties to subnational leaders, Cárdenas also weighed in on local recruitment practices, helped determine which activists received promotions, and controlled the internal flow of information.\footnote{Cárdenas’s control of information flows helped him impose the informal party line of democratic intransigence and sustained confrontation with the PRI (about which more below). See Borjas (2003): 299.}

It should be noted that Cárdenas did not enjoy a complete monopoly on vertical ties. Rodríguez (n.d.) observes that the PRD’s vertical structure of power, whereby subnational organs established individual, direct linkages with the national organization in pursuit of patronage, resources, and ideological influence, did empower other national leaders in addition to Cárdenas. Yet other national leaders’ vertical linkages paled in comparison to Cárdenas’s, who had relationships with a much larger number of local leaders than any other national elite, and who often commanded local leaders’ unconditional loyalty.

_Cárdenas’s horizontal crossfractional ties_

Cárdenas supplemented vertical crossfractional ties with horizontal crossfractional ties at the national level. Just as he established hub-and-spokes relationships with the PRD’s subnational leaders and organs, he established a network of direct, personal, and informal ties across the distinct national _corrientes_ and their leaders. When Cárdenas skyrocketed to national prominence in the late 1980s, ‘the establishment of direct contacts with [Cárdenas] became almost a rule’ for national left leaders (Prud’homme 1997: 12, note 30). As early as 1988, many FDN and PMS elites had established direct ties to Cárdenas that supplanted their previous party disciplines and loyalties. This dynamic persisted. Throughout the 1990s, ‘Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas occupied the center, toward which the distinct _corrientes_ with their respective leaders converged’ (Prud’homme 2003: 118).

Cárdenas position at the hub of the national organization stemmed, in part, from bonds of loyalty. Cárdenas commanded the respect and near unconditional loyalty of the intransigent sectors of the national leadership, drawn from social left organizations such as the ACNR, ORPC, and MAS. Yet other sectors of the national leadership did not possess similar loyalty to Cárdenas. In particular, national leaders from the traditional Marxist left and reformist sectors of the CD opposed Cárdenas’s policies and often viewed him as a competitor. In order to draw these elites to the table, Cárdenas depended more on leverage than on loyalty.

208Prud’homme paraphrasing Jorge Alcocer. Prud’homme paraphrases Alcocer that ‘the establishment of direct contacts with [Cárdenas] became almost a rule. At the moment the PMS gave up its registry, the only nucleus that continued to function as a party organization was composed of ex-leaders of the PSUM and the PMT’ (12, note 30). Regarding FDN leaders, Borjas (2003) writes that they were ‘aware, to varying degrees, that their position was the result of Cárdenas’s vote, and as a result, each directly established bonds of loyalty and political commitment...to the charismatic leader, more than to the social or political organization that he or she came from’ (311).
Lower elites recognized Cárdenas’s indispensability for the party’s electoral success, for their own internal legitimation (should they need it), and for party unity. Consequently, they submitted to his leadership.

One journalist and political activist from Mexico City independently invoked the hub-and-spokes metaphor to characterize Cárdenas’s dealings with lower elites in the national organization, or with individuals and groups who wished to join the PRD. Then, echoing the earlier critique that Cárdenas undermined horizontal linkages between subnational organs, the journalist argued that Cárdenas also undermined horizontal linkages within the national organization, intentionally meeting with only one or two people at a time in order to ‘keep himself above others’.

It should also be noted, however, that in order to stand above national leaders and corrientes during the PRD’s formative period, Cárdenas made a consistent effort to avoid direct involvement in disputes and, when directly involved, not to dismiss any perspectives. Cárdenas himself wrote in August of 1995, ‘I have tried to avoid being involved in disputes between groups and factions within the party’.

At national congresses and other public debates, Cárdenas did not reject opposing points of view or lord his power over those who disagreed with him. Instead, ‘in the public domain, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas insisted on presenting himself as just another party member’ (Borjas 2003: 509) and attempted, where possible, to synthesize moderate and radical positions.

base-level support; and he occupied a singular position at the hub of the PRD’s vertical and horizontal networks. National elites of an extraparliamentary bent supported him unconditionally. Reformist national elites from the PMS and CD recognized his indispensability for party unity, valued his coattails, and often, in pursuit of their internal objectives (e.g., the party presidency), could not afford to oppose him. Due to vertical and horizontal centralization in the person of Cárdenas, ‘getting the party to adopt a policy depended less on debate or construction of a compromise than on convincing Cárdenas’ (Bruhn 1998: 190). Due to all these factors, Cárdenas ‘stood above the different leaders that converged and coexisted in the PRD’ and every perredista knew it. In short, Cárdenas enjoyed unquestioned internal authority.

Key illustrations of Cárdenas’s unquestioned authority (1989-2000)

What did Cárdenas do with his unquestioned internal authority? In broad terms, as already stated, Cárdenas acted as the PRD’s substitute for institutionalized procedures of decision-making and conflict resolution. Recognizing and capitalizing on his unquestioned internal authority and indispensability, Cárdenas, as he saw fit, imposed decisions unilaterally and without consulting party leaders or statutes. When interests required balancing, or conflicts arose, Cárdenas served as an active broker and arbiter, mediating and negotiating agreements and adjudicating internal conflicts.

In order to manage his decision-making agenda and responsibilities as leader, Cárdenas, in a practice known as comunización, appointed a network of aides, to whom he delegated and entrusted different tasks. Although these individuals did not hold formal positions within the PRD apparatus, they spoke for Cárdenas and thus, along with Cárdenas, acted as the hub of the PRD’s vertical network and national horizontal network. The cardenista nucleus never became a formal corriente, but it did constitute, for Prud’homme (1997) and Rodríguez (n.d.), the early PRD’s dominant coalition. The ‘central factor’ of this dominant coalition, Rodríguez (n.d.) writes, ‘was Cárdenas’s incontestable leadership’ (liderazgo incontestable) (256).

What were the critical, contentious decisions that Cárdenas rendered or imposed during the PRD’s formative years? Cárdenas exercised his power and vanquished internal competitors in three critical areas: candidate selection, internal promotion, and programmatic/tactical development. Within each of these areas, a number of key processes and episodes illustrate Cárdenas’s enduring and near absolute control of the early PRD.

From 1989 to 1993, national conflict within the PRD centered, most centrally, on whether the PRD should embrace intransigence, mobilization, and the party-movement model (the intransigente, or rupturista view), or instead seek change through reform in the institutional sphere (the reformist view). To the chagrin of reformists, Cárdenas’s informal decision-making and arbitration, during the late 1980s and early 1990s, wholly substituted for internal procedures and led decisively to the consolidation of the línea de intransigencia.

At the PRD’s founding Constituent Assembly of May 1989, national leaders agreed, almost universally, on the right to organize in corrientes. The PRD’s initial corrientes corresponded to the party’s feeder categories. The most disciplined corriente, the PMS, supported reformist positions, as did the CD corriente’s more moderate wing (headed by Porfirio Muñoz 212 Prud’homme (1997) treats Cárdenas and his nucleus of loyalists as a hegemonic dominant coalition, while Rodríguez (n.d.: 256) treats them as a Bonapartist dominant coalition. Ledo). The more radical sector of the CD, headed by Cárdenas, supported rupturista positions, as did the social left corrientes (e.g., ORPC, MAS, ACNR, OIR-LM). Reformist groups from the CD and PMS insisted on giving corrientes primacy, in part, to establish counterweights to Cárdenas’s internal powers (facultades) (Martínez 2005: 101).²¹³ Yet party elites allowed Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, the unofficial leader, to appoint all thirty-two members of an interim CEN.²¹⁴ Tellingly, they also agreed that the CEN would not include a Secretary General position, which ‘would strengthen the structure but counteract [Cárdenas’s] personal leadership’ (Martínez 2005: 101). Explaining the decision not to include the Secretary General post, Andrés Manuel López Obrador stated in La Jornada: ‘Competing power centers cannot be generated in the party; the indisputable leader is Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas’.²¹⁶

Cárdenas’s CEN appointments ‘reproduced the balance of power between corrientes’ (Martínez 2005: 61), but also reflected Cárdenas’s own personal ties. Composed of ‘leaders who symbolized the party’s struggle’, and characterized by the ‘coexistence of many partisan and organizational cultures’ (100), the first CEN included fifteen CD members, split between rupturistas and reformists, ten social left leaders, and six traditional Marxist leaders, all pemesistas (PMS). A large number of these individuals were Cárdenas’s friends, previous collaborators, fellow ex-príistas, new allies, and fellow rupturistas (61, 63).

The appointments produced instant recriminations from excluded groups (e.g., MAP) and quarrels within and between the CD and PMS corrientes, especially in Mexico City.²¹⁷

²¹³Porfirio Muñoz Ledo added in a 2009 interview that the corriente-based internal structure of the PRD reflected the party’s PRI origins. We organized the party in corrientes, he stated, because ‘we [the Corriente Democrática] were a PRI corriente’. See 20 años del PRD: Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, May 22, 2009.

²¹⁴Informal negotiations between corriente leaders determined the composition of the provisional Consejo Nacional.

infighting led Cárdenas to create a Coordinating Commission, composed mainly of allies, which became responsible for the party’s ‘fundamental decisions’ until the formation of the next CEN (Martínez 2005: 63). ‘Not by chance’, most individuals kept off the Cárdenas-appointed Commission had supported reformist, not rupturista, positions in the previous months (Martínez 2005: 63, 100).

At the Foro de Estatutos, held in July 1989, national leaders reviewed and finalized the basic statutes to be voted on at the first Congress in November 1990. This Congress would also elect the party’s first full-term president and Consejo Nacional. The statutes agreed upon at the Foro granted extensive powers to the president, assumed in advance to be Cárdenas. Not only could the president appoint all members of the CEN, the CEN had to vote as a bloc, such that opposition corrientes in the CEN could not easily veto presidential initiatives. The Foro reaffirmed the removal of the Secretary General post, which ‘consolidated [Cárdenas’s] ascendance and role as a substitute for the lack of institutionalization’ (Martínez 2005: 101, emphasis added). With these measures, Cárdenas, ‘supported by the radical sector of the CD and groups on the social left’, ‘confirmed his authority in detriment to the factions interested in regulating his authority (mando)’ (Martínez 2005: 101).

In addition to using appointment powers to strengthen the rupturista position in the national PRD organization, Cárdenas wielded his base-level clout to impose the line of intransigence on reformist elements at the subnational level. Rodríguez (n.d.) observes that Cárdenas’s ‘moral leadership...allowed him to control the terms of negotiation with outside political forces’ (255). He ‘was the one who could establish the line separating ‘friends from enemies’, and the boundary between ‘congruencia and betrayal, central axes of political identity, particularly visible in contexts of high political polarization’ such as the PRD’s (255). Consequently, according to Borjas (2003), he could ‘[impose] his vision of the PRD

as a party-movement and justify the line of democratic intransigence and the strategy of confrontation with the government’ (Borjas 2003: 451).\(^{219}\)

By way of illustration, after the mid-1989 municipal elections in Michoacán, PRD senator from Michoacán, Roberto Robles Garnica, criticized party activists for conducting prolonged occupations of various city halls in protest of perceived fraud. A group of local PRD legislators accepted the municipal results and participated in the formation of plural local governments. In response, Cárdenas issued a statement in support of the protesting activists. Despite Robles’s public critique and the local PRD legislators’ acceptance of the electoral results, the protesters, ‘on learning that they had the charismatic leader’s support, maintained the occupation of the city halls’ (Borjas 2003, p. 352), and Robles and the local PRD legislators ‘submitted to the line that Cárdenas imposed’ (Borjas 2003, p. 357). To observers, such episodes suggested an ‘anarchy’ within the PRD that ‘only Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas could counteract due to the arbitrating role that local leaders gave him’ (Borjas 2003: 371).

Throughout this period, the top two lower elites, Porfirio Muñoz Ledo and Heberto Castillo, openly opposed two central developments: first, the consolidation of the line of intransigence; second, the reliance on Cárdenas’s informal decisions, base-level appeals, brokerage, and arbitration, not on routinized procedures, for distributing positions and choosing party tactics and program (Borjas 2003: 303-6). Nevertheless, they possessed virtually no internal leverage and ‘decided to back the charismatic leader’ (305-6). Neither Muñoz Ledo nor Castillo and the traditional Marxist left ‘played a relevant role in the decision-making process’ (306). ‘Their proposals and critiques were debated’, but ‘they ended up being discarded ‘democratically’ by the cardenista majority, which declared in favor of intransigence and confrontation’ (Borjas 2003: 303-4). Equally, although Muñoz Ledo and Castillo enjoyed a margin of autonomy in certain spheres (e.g., Muñoz Ledo in the legislature), and also intended in the longer term to change the party’s institutional and tactical profile, they ‘recognized Cárdenas’s initial and short-term importance as a unifier of diverse groups’, a ‘representative of the collective party identity’, and ‘a decisive source of unity necessary for party consolidation’ (305-6).

At the PRD’s first Congress, in November 1990, party radicals ascended. Delegates to the Congress, selected through different procedures by municipal and state organs, voted for the party presidency and the Consejo Nacional. In an election outcome that Martínez (2005: 64, 102) calls ‘natural’ and a ‘rubber stamp’ (tramite), Cárdenas ran for the party presidency unopposed and prevailed. The rupturista social left fared well in the concurrent election for the CN, with a plurality of twenty-three seats to the CD’s twenty-one and the PMS’s eighteen. Similar to Cárdenas’s previous interim CEN, the new CEN’s ‘composition reproduced the balance of power expressed in the Congress with the additional ingredient of loyalty to the leader’ (Prud’homme 1997: 15). At the Congress, Cárdenas unambiguously endorsed intransigencia, rejecting any negotiation that did not entail the ‘dismantling’ of the PRI regime (64). Prominent traditional Marxists who had criticized the línea de intransigencia, notably Jorge Alcocer and José Woldenberg, did not receive CEN appointments, prompting their defection and strong objections from other prominent traditional Marxists such as Heberto Castillo and Arnoldo Martínez Verdugo (Borjas 2003: 375).221

The 1991 midterm elections, while a major setback for the PRD as a whole, strengthened the internal position of intransigentes. First, in internal, relative terms, the social left fared very well in the 1991 elections, electing eighteen federal deputies, to the traditional left’s thirteen and the CD’s four. In Prud’homme’s (1997) formulation, these results ‘displaced’ the CD ‘as the support base for the party leadership’ (Prud’homme 1997: 16 note 41). Second, the election results did not undermine the authority of Cárdenas, who had not participated. In fact, for some, the results bolstered Cárdenas’s authority, evidencing the PRD’s inability to win votes without Cárdenas atop the ticket. Cárdenas ‘remained the source of unity of the groups that converged in the party and, moreover, through rhetoric and actions consistent with party objectives, he distributed the collective incentives necessary to maintain party activism and participation in spite of defeats’ (455).

Even though pemesistas and CD moderates had fared poorly, they read the PRD’s overall results as vindicating: at the ballot box, intransigencia evidently had not paid off. Heberto Castillo and other reformists criticized radical groups for their parallel clandestine activities and, as reported in Financiero, called on the PRD to force them ‘out of the shadows’. Party radicals, for their part, attributed the PRD’s poor results to fraud and other disadvantages and argued for continued intransigence. Cárdenas denounced the PRI’s electoral abuses and, in order to sustain morale at the base level, intensified his rhetoric of intransigence. ‘Radicalizing the battle of ideas’ in favor of confrontation with the PRI, writes Borjas (2003), ‘constituted the only alternative for the PRD to guarantee its survival as a political force’ (455).

In sum, during the PRD’s initial few years, internal struggles centered, most immediately, on the intransigente/reformist debate, and Cárdenas imposed the line of intransigence. ‘As the one responsible for building bridges, but also interested in dodging rules that would limit his leadership’, Cárdenas personally staffed the early CENs and Coordinating Commission and sought to reproduce the rough balance of power between corrientes (Martínez 2005: 99). Yet simultaneously, so far as possible, he appointed allies and tilted the balance toward fellow rupturistas. He imposed the line of intransigence, where necessary, on reformist party elites at the subnational level (e.g., Michoacán). His firm intransigencia and support from the PRD base contributed decisively to the ascendance of radical social left forces at the 1990 Congress and in the 1991 legislative elections. In all these ways, Cárdenas ‘gradually steered the ship in favor of the social left’ and tactics of mobilization and confrontation (99).

Through these actions, Cárdenas demonstrated that his informal role as decider and arbiter prevailed over any routinized procedures for collective decision-making and conflict resolution. ‘Between 1989 and 1993’, Martínez (2005) writes, ‘What is the party and how is it going to work? were questions to which perredistas did not have a common answer, beyond their recognition of Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas’s undisputed leadership (liderazo indiscutido)’ (104-5). Borjas (2003) summarizes that a few years into the PRD’s existence, ‘relations between PRD elites still emerged around specific disputes for positions that, arbitrated by Cardenas...reinforced the predominance of the charismatic leader, who continued imposing himself above institutional procedures’ (Borjas 2003: 516). In the early PRD, Cárdenas’s word was effectively law.

It should be noted that many early PRD elites, predominantly reformists, objected to the extreme and informal centralization of power in Cárdenas’s person. Cárdenas’s power, they charged, diminished the independence and vitality of local leaders and organizations, prevented the creation of horizontal linkages, and above all, prevented internal routinization. Jorge Alcocer, for example, emphasized in his resignation letter that crucial decisions took place through informal exchange and negotiation, always revolving around Cárdenas, instead of formal and transparent decision-making processes that would empower the party base. This disqualified the PRD, he suggested, from claiming the mantle of democracy: ‘In order to participate in discussion, one must be aligned with Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas. If authoritarianism is the enemy, the PRD must be consistent in its internal life. The truth is that party-related manners are not settled through the party’s formal institutions but through private consultations [with Cárdenas], an arrangement that ‘concentrates functions in the party president’ (Proceso no. 740, 1/7/1991).

Heberto Castillo quickly became marginal within the PRD due to his outspoken, frequently public critiques of Cárdenas’s caudillismo (e.g., in Proceso). Castillo’s public airing of grievances damaged his reputation among the large cardenista base of the PRD (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 448), and Castillo did not possess a strong independent base of his own. Even within the PMS, he mainly commanded the support of PMT cuadros. Although Muñoz Ledo agreed with Castillo that Cárdenas’s leadership style undermined routinization, he made a realistic, calculated decision to continue ‘[accepting] the predominance of Cárdenas’s leadership’ (449). Only in subsequent years, when political circumstances changed, and he had accumulated significant political capital as a PRD legislator, would Muñoz Ledo attempt to challenge Cárdenas for leadership of the party.

In late 1992, a PRD corriente, Corriente por la Reforma Democrática del PRD, formed in opposition to the authoritarian, personalistic structure of the PRD. Echoing a commonly voiced critique, the corriente’s founders argued that Cárdenas, instead of encouraging subnational organs to develop their own identities and voices, created vertical power structures based on personal loyalty. In a document published in Proceso, they wrote that the ‘informal network of loyalties [to Cárdenas]’ constituted the ‘real leadership’ of the PRD and was ‘eroding’ the organizational bases of the PRD and replacing a policy of activist

Selecting the 1994 presidential candidate

According to some perredistas, prior to the 1988 presidential election, Cárdenas and Porfirio Muñoz Ledo agreed that if Cárdenas lost in 1988, Muñoz Ledo would receive the candidacy in 1994. Cárdenas has denied this claim. Regardless, the PRD did not have a formal procedure in place for deciding the candidacy.

Effectively, the Mexican public and PRD base decided the matter by demanding that Cárdenas run. Because PRD members and supporters revered Cárdenas, and also recognized his unique capacity to attract support outside the party, they overwhelmingly pressed for his candidacy in 1994. The PRD base did not demonstrate its support for Cárdenas through formal procedures. As would occur six years later, support for Cárdenas’s candidacy bubbled up outside formal party channels, from perredistas and non-perredistas alike. On February 5, 1993, at a public event celebrating the anniversary of the Mexican Constitution’s signing, nearly one-thousand Mexican citizens, mostly but not exclusively PRD activists, proposed that Cárdenas run. Cárdenas provisionally accepted and later leveraged this internal and public support to secure the candidacy through informal negotiation. In a late 1990s interview, Muñoz Ledo stated that overwhelming internal demand for Cárdenas’s candidacy induced him, in this informal negotiation, not to compete for the nomination: ‘It’s clear that Cuauhtémoc’s leadership of the party was very broad, and that our people were...programmed for revenge... Overwhelmingly, the majority of the party were for [Cárdenas]... So I told him that I wouldn’t compete’.

On February 28 of 1993, Cárdenas resigned the presidency of the PRD to begin his campaign for the Mexican presidency (Martínez 2005: 67). Many national PRD leaders believed that Cárdenas’s absence from internal party affairs might facilitate routinization. With Cárdenas on the campaign trail, the rest of the party leadership might have time and room to hammer out and consolidate formal decision-making and conflict resolution procedures, which would replace Cárdenas’s informal arbitration (Borjas 2003: 508-9).

In July 1993, several months after Cárdenas’s resignation, the PRD held its second Congress. Like the first Congress, the second Congress would include the election, by congressional delegates, of the PRD’s next president. The winner would replace interim president Roberto Robles Garnica, former priísta and member of the CD.

The second Congress reflected and contributed to several important shifts in the early PRD. First, the election for party president triggered the first of several attempts, by the PRD during its formative phase, to compose the CEN via procedure, not through informal negotiations dependent on leaders’ ties and loyalty to Cárdenas. The 1993 race for party president marked the first in which Cárdenas did not participate. Given Cárdenas’s absence, the national party lacked its informal mechanism for distributing CEN secretarías post-election. ‘Competing without Cárdenas’s direct arbitration and aware of the risk of schism’ (fractura), the candidates for the PRD presidency agreed, in advance of the election, to use a formal proportional representation system in the allotment of CEN secretarías (Martínez 2005: 68).

In particular, each candidate would run as part of a planilla, a formal coalition of national... leaders that could mix corrientes. A candidate’s share of the congressional vote would determine the number of CEN secretarías and CN seats allotted to his or her planilla. The planillas would determine internally, via negotiation beforehand, which individuals would receive secretarías and CN seats. The agreement also stipulated that if the winning candidate lacked an absolute majority, the second-place planilla would receive the newly created number-two Secretary General position, the number-two post in the CEN.

Second, the Congress both reflected and contributed to a shift in the axis of competition within the PRD. During Cárdenas’s tenure as party president, corrientes and coalitions in the CEN and CN had corresponded very closely to the party’s initial feeder organizations: the CD, the PMS, and different social left groups. By the second Congress, national leaders had reorganized the PRD’s national coalitions around ideological proposals, some internally focused, others externally focused (Martínez 2005: 67). These new coalitions cut across and mixed the PRD’s three initial feeder categories.

Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, one of two PRD senators at the time, led the Arco Iris (Rainbow) planilla, which spanned the CD, PMS, and social left. The Arco Iris planilla favored a negotiated democratic transition. In addition, it called for the PRD to focus on a concrete governing program, externally, and on the routinization of decision-making and conflict resolution, internally.

Three candidates ran in opposition to Muñoz Ledo. Heberto Castillo led the Cambio Democrático planilla, which included elements of the PMS and elements of the CD. Castillo based his campaign on a critique of the PRD’s internal functioning: in particular, of the party’s low transparency and its multiple layers of presidentialism, whereby each corriente followed the dictates of its leader, and the distribution of candidacies and internal positions across corrientes depended on opaque informal processes of negotiation and arbitration, all revolving around Cárdenas. His planilla proposed greater decision-making transparency and Mario Saucedo of the ACNR led the Trisecta coalition, composed exclusively of social left and independent leaders. Trisecta opposed negotiation, embraced tactics of mobilization, and envisioned the PRD as an agent of social movements and organizations. Finally, Pablo Gómez of the PMS led a relatively small coalition that, like Castillo’s, focused on internal issues. Gómez’s planilla proposed a primary system for electing both party leaders and party candidates (Martínez 2005: 68-9).

Although Cárdenas did not run in the election, he decided the outcome by providing critical, if unspoken, support to the bid of Muñoz Ledo. ‘Whoever wanted to lead the PRD had to win Cárdenas’ favor’ (Borjas 2003: 522). Muñoz Ledo was the ‘unquestioned leader of the PRD’s legislative bloc’ and had demonstrated a unique ‘capacity to reach deals outside of the party domain’ (Borjas 2003: 530). Given his reformist, institutionalist views and exceptional political abilities, most of the PRD’s ‘historical figures’ favored him (e.g., Ifigenia Martínez). Yet Muñoz Ledo ‘had abstained from establishing ties of loyalty to the bases that might have allowed him to contest Cárdenas’s leadership’ (Borjas 2003: 530). To win a plurality of congressional delegate votes, Muñoz Ledo needed Cárdenas’s support.

Although Cárdenas and Muñoz Ledo disagreed on fundamental questions of external tactics and internal procedure, Cárdenas quietly lent favor to Muñoz Ledo, fellow CD member and the party’s most able and decorated public servant. The party presidency constituted an implicit consolation prize for Muñoz Ledo, in exchange for Cárdenas’s having taken the PRD’s nomination for the 1994 presidential race. Cárdenas supported Muñoz Ledo for other reasons as well. Unlike Heberto Castillo, Muñoz Ledo had shied away from direct 230 Muñoz Ledo himself later stated that he and Cárdenas struck a deal whereby Cárdenas took the presidential nomination, Muñoz Ledo the party presidency (20 años del PRD: Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, May 22, 2009). See also Borjas (2003): 531.

criticisms of Cárdenas, even though Muñoz Ledo, like Castillo, objected to the personalization, centralization, and lack of routinization associated with Cárdenas’s internal leadership (Borjas 2003: 530). In addition, Cárdenas trusted that Muñoz Ledo possessed the will and capacity to manage internal affairs effectively and ‘lead the party to institutionalization’, a prospect Cárdenas did not seem to oppose (Borjas 2003: 531).

With Cárdenas’s considerable weight behind him, Muñoz Ledo won with a large plurality of congressional votes (42 percent), while Saucedo placed second and Castillo a close third. Muñoz Ledo thus assumed the presidency and Saucedo the position of Secretary General. In order to marginalize Castillo, Muñoz Ledo named Pablo Gómez to the presidency of the Consejo Nacional (Pivron 1999: 263-4). All four candidates’ planillas’ received roughly proportional shares of CEN and CN seats.

It should be noted that the second Congress, in addition to electing the new CEN and CN, approved and codified a new set of procedures for future internal elections. The new rules synthesized different corrientes’ proposals, mandating continued use of the planilla PR system and, crucially, a new primary system. In future elections for party president, candidates would have to compete for PRD members’ votes in closed primaries, not for delegate votes at party congresses.

The 1994 crisis and Cárdenas’s resilience

The mid-1990s produced a set of challenges for Cárdenas’s leadership. Even before the electoral failure of 1994, the PRD’s internal battle of ideas had begun to shift in the reformists’ favor. The shift began with Muñoz Ledo’s victory, facilitated by Cárdenas’s backing, in the 1993 internal election. Although Cárdenas supported Muñoz Ledo’s bid, Muñoz Ledo’s victory, and the subsequent proportional allotment of CEN and CN seats, constituted an advance for the moderate, pro-negotiation wing of the PRD. Whereas rupturistas had previously dominated the internal debate, after the 1993 internal, ‘the disagreement between Muñoz Ledo and Cárdenas over the PRD’s role in the transition to democracy’ became a less lopsided and more contentious battle within the PRD (Martínez 2005: 70). Between the second Congress and the 1994 presidential election, ‘two sides would tighten the party’: the rupturistas, composed of Cárdenas, CD sectors, and most of the social left, and the reformists, composed of CD sectors, the former PMS, and the former MAP (70-1).

Tensions mounted between Cárdenas and Muñoz Ledo in particular. In a March 1994 interview with La Jornada, Cárdenas did not recognize the electoral reform agreements that Muñoz Ledo had reached with PRI legislators in the senate. Cárdenas’s statement caused a rupture in the PRD congressional bloc, with almost half of the PRD’s deputies voting against the agreement, and several abstaining (Martínez 2005: 70). In addition, Cárdenas openly questioned Muñoz Ledo’s decision to fire and replace Samuel del Villar, PRD representative to the IFE. A CD member, intransigent, and Cárdenas appointee, Villar had caused controversy by raising questions about the Mexican electoral registry, controlled by the IFE (70).

Reformists scored another important internal victory prior to the 1994 general election. Before the election, several members of the CEN left their posts in order to mount campaigns. Muñoz Ledo capitalized, using the occasion to reorganize the CEN and empower the reformist wing of the party. Muñoz Ledo distributed fourteen of twenty CEN positions to reformists, including the most important positions under his control.

Nevertheless, before the 1994 election, the rupturistas still retained the upper hand. Although reformists formally controlled the internal apparatus after the July 1993 Congress, the number-two post of Secretary General still belonged to rupturista Mario Saucedo (ex-ACNR), and more importantly, the debate remained ‘tilted toward the rupturistas given the [party’s] warlike relationship with Carlos Salinas and the strong leadership of Cárdenas’ (Martínez 2005: 70-1). Reformists thus had little choice but to accept Cárdenas’s decisions, popular among the PRD’s largely social left base, to meet with the Subcomandante Marcos of the Zapatista National Liberation Army, to oppose NAFTA, and to back out of negotiations on electoral reform.

The 1994 election significantly affected the balance of the rupturista/reformist debate. Cárdenas underperformed abysmally, and in contrast to the 1991 congressional elections, moderates within the national leadership, in 1994, could read the electoral outcome as a public verdict against Cárdenas. The election, they argued, constituted an implicit rebuke of the línea de intransigencia that Cárdenas and his base-level supporters espoused. Rupturistas’ uncompromising stand on negotiation, in addition to other questionable choices such as meeting with Comandante Marcos and opposing NAFTA, had clearly not paid off electorally. With electoral results to back up their assertions, reformist critics and their arguments now carried more internal weight than before.

After the 1994 election, instead of taking a formal position within the PRD, Cárdenas founded a think tank, the Fundación para la Democracia, and officially received the designation of ‘moral leader’ of the PRD. The ascendance of the reformist wing culminated in events at the PRD’s third Congress, in late August of 1995. The rupturistas, led by Cárdenas, proposed that the PRD demand Zedillo’s resignation. The reformists, or dialoguistas, led by Muñoz Ledo, proposed that the PRD recognize Zedillo’s legitimacy and participate in a pacted transition to democracy (Martínez 2005: 73). In May of that year, Muñoz Ledo had captured the prevailing view among dialoguistas, stating that it was ‘necessary to decide if what we want is the defense of certain principles even at the risk of becoming marginal’.

ing a societal referendum on Zedillo’s impeachment and losing another congressional vote, accepted the reformists’ victory.

Despite the results of the Congress, Cárdenas’s leadership and authority remained uncompromised. On the one hand, his persistence in the radical line continued to sustain the loyalties of the many perredista militantes who favored intransigence (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 64). On the other, Cárdenas took actions that strengthened his reputation as the PRD’s internal peacemaker and unifier. First, he publicly recognized and praised Muñoz Ledo for his leadership and efforts (Martínez 2005: 74, note 56). Second, he openly addressed a prominent critique, apologizing to the party for having created an independent campaign committee during the 1994 presidential race. According to Pivron (1999), ‘the recovery of Cárdenas’s leadership reached its apex when he recognized his errors... By ‘conceding’, Cárdenas recovered his image as a great conciliator, a symbol of unity...who prioritized institutional over personal interests. In reality, he had regained (recobrado) his leadership’ (266). In short, coming out of the 1994 presidential election and the third PRD Congress in 1995, Cárdenas maintained broad internal authority. He retained his image as above faction and symbolic of the party as a whole, while his continued commitment to intransigence kept radicals psychologically invested in the PRD.

The 1995-6 period marked the apex of Muñoz Ledo’s trajectory within the PRD. Not only did he oversee the reformists’ victory at the 1995 Congress, he also played an instrumental 232 Bruhn (1998) summarizes that after 1994, Cárdenas remained the PRD’s ‘strongest unifying force’ and ‘an important reference point for many perredistas, giving him latitude to affect party policy against the preferences of the national leadership by making public policy statements, ingenuously identifying himself as just a PRD member with liberty to express his opinion, but fully aware of his impact’ (Bruhn 1998: 193).

233 Borjas (2003, vol. II) summarizes Muñoz Ledo, in contrast to Cárdenas, as follows: ‘Cárdenas’s behavior was guided by the principles on which internal legitimization in the PRD was based... [If] he was the charismatic leader who moved the bases and disciplined the party leaders and legislative bloc, Muñoz Ledo was the statesman who, fortified by the pressure that that could represent, had managed to convert PRD principles into facts and concrete content’ (note 244, 121).
role in the passage of new internal procedural reforms and, even more importantly, the landmark electoral reforms of 1996 in the Mexican national legislature. As noted earlier, these reforms represented a decisive step in Mexico’s democratic transition, and Muñoz Ledo, among perredistas, could rightfully claim the most responsibility for them. Together, Muñoz Ledo’s legislative activities and achievements consolidated the PRD’s internal strategic shift from ‘intransigencia to limited cooperation’ (Prud’homme 2003: 103).

Despite all this, Muñoz Ledo, as a leader, remained clearly secondary to Cárdenas. In mid-1996, Muñoz Ledo launched a series of accusations against Cárdenas in order – according to Borjas (2003: 86) – to strengthen his position within the party. In the weeks before the mid-July election for party president, Muñoz Ledo stated publicly that Cárdenas, after the 1988 presidential election, had held two secret meetings with Carlos Salinas de Gortari and Manuel Camacho, the Federal District’s newly appointed regente. In Proceso, Muñoz Ledo described these meetings as ‘incongruous’ with Cárdenas subsequent stance of intransigencia. He also criticized the timing, questioning Cárdenas’s decision to engage in dialogue when the public would have supported intransigence (i.e., in 1988), and later to insist on intransigence in a ‘radical, strident, and unnecessary’ manner well into the 1990s, after the appropriate moment had passed. Cárdenas denied that the meetings took place and called Muñoz Ledo’s accusations ‘lies’ and ‘fantasies’

Muñoz Ledo’s gambit backfired. Top national PRD leaders, as well as influential leftists not in the PRD, either backed Cárdenas (Heberto Castillo, Gilberto Rincón Gallardo, Jorge Alcocer) or remained neutral and downplayed the conflict (AMLO, Amalia García).
Alcocer accused Muñoz Ledo of sowing seeds of discord and suspicion. The PRD base also forcefully supported Cárdenas. Thus, ‘instead of becoming stronger within the PRD, Muñoz Ledo brought about the forceful confirmation and unconditional backing of Cárdenas’s leadership by the PRD base and leadership (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 86).

In the heat of the conflict, and just a week before the mid-July internal presidential election, Heberto Castillo wrote of Muñoz Ledo in Proceso: ‘Porfirio never managed to escape from the shadow of the caudillo that Cardenas has been, first as the unity candidate of nearly all of [the country’s] left forces, and later in the PRD, which is founded on the directives that [Cárdenas] imposes with his charismatic force among the perredista bases.

The 1996 election for PRD president

In mid-July of 1996, over 300,000 perredistas, roughly a fourth of the party membership, cast their vote in a closed primary for Muñoz Ledo’s successor. The 1996 internal election marked an important and enduring shift in the structure of competition within the PRD. While internal coalitions had corresponded to the party’s initial feeder categories in 1990, and to ideological positions in 1993, in the 1996 campaign, internal coalitions mixed feeder groups and ideologies and reflected, above all, personal loyalties (Martínez 2005: 24, 214). This trend has persisted to the present day.

PRD members elected Andrés Manuel López Obrador by an overwhelming margin. Amalia García, whom Muñoz Ledo backed, received under ten percent of the vote. Two thirds of the vote were cast in Michoacán, the Federal District, Mexico state, and AMLO’s native Tabasco. In a well-calibrated campaign that targeted the PRD’s organized bases, AMLO identified himself as center-left but also declared himself a revolutionary nationalist à la Cárdenas.

239 Proceso no. 1027, July 7, 1996.
Most centrally, however, he placed emphasis on political tactics – specifically, the importance of mass mobilization – rather than specific policy proposals. AMLO characterized the party v. party-movement debate as a false choice: ‘As some negotiate, others help by mobilizing society’.\footnote{AMLO’s initial campaign speech, quoted in Borjas (2003, vol. II): 82.} If the PRI committed fraud even at the gubernatorial level, he claimed, the PRD must use its mobilizing capacity to create a national crisis (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 82). He also insisted on negotiating with the PRI as equals, not as ‘ants to elephants’ (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 82).

AMLO’s rise within the party did not result from internal moral stature, as in the case of Cárdenas, or from decades of accumulated political capital and connections, as in the case of Muñoz Ledo (Martínez 2005: 200-1). Instead, his rise resulted from short-term success at building a large coalition that cut across feeder categories and ideological perspectives. Crucially, AMLO’s success at internal coalition-building stemmed from his ‘proximity’ to Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas\footnote{Borjas (2003, vol. II) uses the term \textit{proximidad} to describe the Cárdenas/AMLO relationship.} Cárdenas’s ‘backing...activate[d] bridges between previously opposed groups’ (Martínez 2005: 74). More specifically, in negotiations facilitated by Cárdenas, AMLO managed to strike deals and form electoral alliances with Mario Saucedo’s radical corriente and Jesús Ortega’s moderate \textit{Nueva Izquierda corriente}. Prior to the coalition’s formation, Saucedo had campaigned against AMLO’s center-leftism (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 79), while Ortega, like fellow competitors Amalia García and Heberto Castillo, had opposed AMLO’s emphasis on mobilization and argued that the PRD, in order to win at the national level, must abandon the logic of a political movement and adopt the logic of a political party\footnote{Proceso, no. 116, April 22, 1996.} Ortega and Saucedo decided to join forces with AMLO, recognizing the likelihood of an absolute majority for AMLO atop such a broad coalition. The leaders agreed that in the event of an absolute majority, the Secretary General position would go to Ortega, while Saucedo’s corriente would benefit in the proportional allotment of CN seats. Thus, in AMLO’s new CEN, Ortega received the post of Secretary General. Other top members of AMLO’s planilla possessed strong ties to Cárdenas, separately reflecting the influence of the PRD’s undisputed leader on the new party president.\(^\text{243}\)

The 1997 DF election, the 1998 Congress, and Cárdenas’s resurgence

After the 1996 internal election, the internal debate between reformists and intransigentes remained intense and unresolved, and tensions between Muñoz Ledo and Cárdenas continued to mount (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 84). The electoral reforms of 1996 opened the Federal District to direct elections, raising the question who in the PRD would run. Both Cárdenas and Muñoz Ledo sought the party’s nomination, and the party held a closed primary to determine the victor. ‘[I]n terms of leadership and popular acceptance, the battle was lost in advance’ for Muñoz Ledo, given Cárdenas’s clout with the PRD base (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 121).\(^\text{244}\) After losing the internal, Muñoz Ledo accepted a candidacy for federal deputy.

According to Borjas (2003, vol. II), Cárdenas’s landslide victory in the first ever direct election for Federal District mayor elevated his internal status to unprecedented heights (233). To begin, Cárdenas benefited from the inevitable glow of victory. Further, his performance restored a sense of hope and confidence in perredistas that the party could win major elections.\(^\text{245}\) Crucially, however, the July 1997 victory also elevated Cárdenas’s status because \(^{243}\) These included Adolfo Gilly, Rodolfo González Guevara, Carlos Lavore, and Ricardo Pascoe (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 83).

\(^{244}\) In a 2009 interview, Muñoz Ledo called the 1997 internal elections ‘unfair’ and ‘very doubtful’, claiming that Cárdenas’s supporters took over polling stations, and the party distributed campaign resources unequally. Muñoz Ledo claims to have informed AMLO, the party president, that he would not again tolerate ‘that kind of internal manipulation’ (20 años del PRD: Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, May 22, 2009).

\(^{245}\) According to Borjas (2003, vol. II), Cárdenas’s victory not only showed ‘that democratic intransigence had borne fruit’, but also that ‘it was possible to continue reaping victories’ (233).
he had refused to make ideological compromises during the campaign. On the contrary, he had remained firmly committed to the línea de intransigencia.

Cárdenas consolidated his elevated status at the PRD’s fourth Congress in March 1998. Given the events of previous months, ‘his leadership was never more complete’ than at the fourth Congress (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 233). Moreover, during the Congress, Cárdenas effectively played the role of bridge-builder. A central debate at the Congress concerned whether to define the PRD as a party of the left. As documented in Proceso, Cárdenas weighed in, stating that instead of using the terms ‘right’ and ‘left’, he preferred to identify the party in terms of ideological content, particularly national sovereignty, liberty, rights of the masses, equality, distributive justice, universal access to education and health.246 Borjas (2003, vol. II) writes that ‘by separating himself from the PRD, Cárdenas once again placed himself above the party, given that he demonstrated a more inclusive attitude that allowed him to build bridges toward other political expressions and set himself up as the center and guarantor of any alliance’ (237).

Cárdenas v. Muñoz Ledo: the selection of the PRD’s 2000 presidential candidate

Internal jockeying for the PRD’s 2000 presidential candidacy began in late 1998, with Cárdenas in the middle of his mayoral term, and Muñoz Ledo nearing the end of his term as president of the Chamber of Deputies. Muñoz Ledo publicly revealed his intention to compete for the PRD’s nomination in October of 1998. In late December, he made a case for himself in Proceso. While recognizing and lauding Cárdenas’s firm ideological convictions, Muñoz Ledo suggested that the argument for Cárdenas rested mainly on lineage, and that the appropriateness of a third Cárdenas run would depend on the success of his hitherto underwhelming tenure as mayor of the Federal District.

The following week, battle lines were drawn. Cárdenas, for the first time, stated that he was inclined to seek the PRD’s nomination and cited the will of the PRD militancia as the critical determinant. ‘Everything depended on which side the militancia favored, and Cárdenas and Muñoz Ledo knew well which side [the militancia] would be on. Thus, as always, the moral leader of the PRD had the last word’ (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 290).

In the early months of 1999, PRD internal leaders, legislators, and militantes rallied around Cárdenas, setting into motion of a series of events that eventuated in Cárdenas’s nomination and Muñoz Ledo’s exit from the party. In January of 1999, over one-hundred PRD deputies penned an open letter in support of Cárdenas’s candidacy, which leaked after party president López Obrador, on Muñoz Ledo’s entreaty, prohibited its circulation (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 290-1). Having previously called a truce in order to avert debilitating internal conflicts, Muñoz Ledo went on the offensive. He rejected the proposal to nominate the party’s candidate through an internal primary (comicios internos), characterizing the proposal as a veiled maneuver for securing Cárdenas’s nomination (292). In early April, after Cárdenas admitted to having met with Carlos Salinas de Gortari after the 1988 election, Muñoz Ledo excoriated the leader for inconsistency and duplicity and, in Proceso on the same day that Cárdenas formally announced his candidacy, called the revelation the ‘collapse of a myth’.

Muñoz Ledo’s offensive maneuver only worsened his internal position. A growing number of PRD leaders, including many key leaders who had long sided with Muñoz Ledo on the party’s central debates – reformism v. rupturismo, institutionalization v. caudillismo – closed ranks around Cárdenas and criticized Muñoz Ledo for doing detriment to the party. Foremost among these was Amalia García, a reformist who had supported Muñoz Ledo’s bid for the party presidency in 1993, and whose bid for the presidency Muñoz Ledo had supported in 1996. In May, the PRD-aligned wing of El Barzón, a popular business and farming movement, publicly declared their support for Cárdenas, while the PRD’s State Committee in Michoacán went ahead and established a pro-Cárdenas campaign committee. PAN overtures regarding a possible PAN/PRD alliance heightened Muñoz Ledo’s vulnerability, as Cárdenas, in virtue of his proven electoral clout, would likely receive more support from panistas.

At the end of May, Cárdenas imposed his candidacy in an unexpected manner. In what Muñoz Ledo would later call a ‘disgraceful’ violation of party statute, Cárdenas, without formally consulting the party, accepted the nomination of the Partido del Trabajo, correctly calculating that this action would induce the PRD to support his bid immediately and, in this way, streamline the nomination process. Given that the PAN’s Vicente Fox had been campaigning for the better part of the year, and that the PRI had also started the campaign season early, speed mattered.

Muñoz Ledo blasted Cárdenas and demanded that the CEN revoke Cárdenas’s membership for violation of party statutes. Predictably, the CEN refused Muñoz Ledo’s demand. Interim president Pablo Gómez said that to do so would be to confront Cárdenas directly, while to deny the soundness of Muñoz Ledo’s argument would be to support Cárdenas. Both, he stated, were unacceptable, as the party leadership must remain neutral. Of course, by remaining neutral, the CEN definitively opened the way for Cárdenas’s nomination – a point not lost on Muñoz Ledo.

250 Borjas (2003, vol. II): 293-4. As an aspirant to the party presidency in 1999, García and other moderates (e.g., Jesús Ortega) had an incentive to support Cárdenas’s third bid (Martínez 2005: 80).

251 Quotation from Amalia García in Proceso, no. 1188, August 8, 1999.

The selection of the PRD’s presidential candidate in 2000 evidenced that, more than a decade after the PRD’s creation, Cárdenas remained above any formal party statute. To summarize the above, in early 1999, Cárdenas almost secured the PRD’s nomination informally due to the sustained outpouring of support he received upon announcing his tentative intention to run. Yet Muñoz Ledo doggedly pursued the nomination, and Cárdenas, if he had chosen to resolve the internal struggle in adherence to party statutes, would have had to engage in internal negotiation and perhaps submit to some type of internal election. This process carried an outside risk of losing and would have sucked valuable time and energy from the presidential campaign. Hence, instead of resolving the struggle institutionally, Cárdenas resolved it unilaterally and in violation of PRD statute, accepting the PT’s nomination, forcing the PRD to nominate him immediately, and marginalizing Muñoz Ledo in a naked demonstration of power.\footnote{The message’, Muñoz Ledo stated in \textit{Proceso}, ‘is that the PRD has an owner’.} Almost a year later, Muñoz Ledo, no longer a perredista, would summarize: ‘When there’s someone above everyone, there is no law. We could never institutionalize the party.’\footnote{Proceso, no. 1227, May 7, 2000.}

The 1999 election for PRD president

Mere weeks after the CEN’s refusal to remove or even censure Cárdenas, the PRD held a closed primary to determine AMLO’s successor. This primary caused the most severe internal crisis in PRD history. Four candidates ran, two moderates from the traditional Marxist left (Amalia García, Jesús Ortega), two radicals from the social left (Mario Saucedo, Rosa Albina Garavito). No ex-priístas ran. García and Ortega violated party statute in running, having contested the previous internal. In the official tally, García prevailed by a very narrow margin, and Ortega’s supporters disputed the results, leading to the invalidation of the election and creation of an interim CEN.

In the interim, all four candidates joined in a shaky coalition, with García atop the ticket. In the event of an absolute majority, Ortega’s ally Jesús Zambrano would receive the Secretary General position, Albina Garavito would receive the position of consejera nacional, and all four candidates’ previous planillas would receive a share of the new coalition planilla’s CEN quota. Eight additional candidates ran, including Ifigenia Martínez, backed by Porfirio Muñoz Ledo and his planilla, Nueva República. Cárdenas supported García, presumably in order to contain Muñoz Ledo. García also claimed the support of AMLO and Ricardo Monreal, capable of delivering Tabasco and Zacatecas virtually wholesale (Martínez 2005: 83).

García prevailed, and Ifigenia Martínez fared so poorly that Muñoz Ledo’s Nueva República planilla won just one seat on the CEN. Utterly marginalized, Muñoz Ledo, in late August, accepted the presidential nomination of the PARM and, in January of 2000, formally exited the PRD (Borjas 2003, vol. II: 298-300). Martínez (2005) writes that, a full decade after the PRD’s creation, the 1999 internal ‘evidenced an alarming inability to channel conflicts through stable procedures’ (83).

The 2000 presidential campaign evidenced the CEN’s weakness, as Cárdenas’s independent committee held primary decision-making power, and García’s ‘unsteady performance’ provoked internal criticism (Martínez 2005: 83). Following Cárdenas’s landslide loss, the PRD called its sixth Congress in twelve years. Prior to the Congress, a conflict arose in the Consejo Nacional between one bloc, led by consejera nacional Rosa Albina Garavito, calling for García’s resignation, and another bloc, led by supporters of García and Ortega, supporting the completion of García’s term. After García refused to step down, Albina, who had joined García’s coalition planilla little more than a year earlier, resigned as consejera nacional.

The Congress provoked a series of debates on tactics and program, with new wings forming around García/Ortega on the moderate, institutionalist side and Cárdenas – along with ally Rosario Robles – on the more radical, movimientista side. The Congress ended with collective agreement on the need for greater internal routinization but also, somewhat ironically, a new set of rules for distributing internal positions. The Congress abolished the planilla system, such that candidates for party president, moving forward, would run accompanied only by a candidate for Secretary General.

The PRD thus remained weakly routinized throughout the formative phase. Until 1993, many basic formal procedures (i.e., for composing the CEN) still did not exist. Subsequently, despite various attempts to routinize decision-making and conflict resolution within the national organization, party leaders, including Cárdenas, regularly violated, rejected, and changed internal procedures. At the turn of the millennium, PRD’s ‘permanent need to revert to methods of informal arbitration in cases of grave internal conflicts evidenced the deficiencies and instability of the PRD’s formal procedures’ (Prud’homme 2003: 118, 104).

Cárdenas’s informal role as decision-maker and arbiter prevailed over any formal procedure. Cárdenas concentrated an incredible amount of decision-making authority. Capitalizing on his moral stature, leverage, and singular position at the hub of the PRD’s vertical 259 Scholars converge in this assessment. The early PRD was ‘led and arbitrated by the charismatic leader’ (Borjas 2003: 445-60). On Prud’homme’s (2003) summary, ‘Cárdenas exercised an important function of informal arbitration in the internal life of the organization’ (118). Martínez (2005) identifies three ‘authentic birthmarks’ of the PRD. The first is Cárdenas’s role as ‘arbiter’: ‘The presence of Cárdenas as the leader of a movement broader than the PRD, who had great legitimacy and was placed at the and horizontal networks, Cárdenas, during the PRD’s formative phase, repeatedly swayed internal presidential elections, brokered the allocation of positions (e.g., secretarías) and candidacies, imposed himself as the party’s candidate in major executive elections, and served as a powerful spokesperson, arbiter, and broker in the PRD’s tactical and programmatic development.

Although Cárdenas played a less active role in internal party life from the mid-1990s onward, internal procedures did not become consolidated, and Cárdenas remained able and willing to broker alliances (e.g., AMLO’s 1996 coalition), tilt or sway internal presidential elections (1996, 1999), and impose himself as the PRD’s top executive candidate (2000). Cárdenas often made these decisions without consulting other key actors.

Throughout the formative period, most moderate party elites and many outside observers criticized Cárdenas’s leadership style, citing its ‘negative consequences for routinization’. These critiques persisted throughout the 1990s. In late December of 1998, for example, perredista and former student leader, Raúl Álvarez Garín, publicly rebuked Cárdenas for his caudillista practices as party leader and jefe de gobierno of the Federal District:

> [Cárdenas] doesn’t discuss problems. He receives them and considers them in private. He doesn’t interact in debates. He doesn’t risk making judgments or proposing solutions to certain problems in a daring manner. [His] hermetism, separated from debate, is damaging for collective political life. He establishes bilateral relationships, and this gives the appearance of favoritism or, even worse, solutions caused by particularistic influences. Naturally, due to his weight in the party and his modus operandi, these are practices that many consider unacceptable and are seen as caudillismo.

center of the party as an arbiter, established balance between forces that compete[d] for his support’ (97). The second ‘birthmark’ is that the corrientes constituted the only avenue of participation. The third is weak routinization and a reliance on informal, short-term measures to resolve disputes. He later summarizes the early PRD national organization as divided between a reformist, traditional wing and a radical, extraparliamentary wing with ‘a charismatic leader, acting as the cement, [who] seeks to balance disputes’ (101).

260 As Borjas (2003) summarizes, Cárdenas’s ‘charisma’ ‘equipped him to impose on the party all key decisions without having to negotiate with the rest of the actors’ (Borjas 2003: 451).

Yet it could be argued that PRD unity, especially in the initial years, hinged on Cárdenas’s assumption of decision-making and conflict resolution responsibilities. By substituting for an internal decision-making and conflict resolution procedure, Cárdenas enabled the PRD to act as one and speak in a single voice. Rodríguez (n.d.) suggests that given the PRD’s ‘unstable equilibrium’, if Cárdenas had not acted as the party’s informal decision-making center and high court, and instead attempted to routinize his charisma by creating a corriente cardenista and submitting to established procedures, the PRD might have fractured (256-7). Later, she writes: ‘Diversity coexisted in a conflictual manner within the party, but during its initial years, [the PRD] generally managed to act in a unified manner’ due to Cárdenas, whose ‘dominance...was sustained thanks to agreements with different groups and the recognition of his incontestable leadership’ (Rodríguez n.d.: 303). In a 2010 historical reflection, party founder and leader Jesús Ortega wrote: ‘In our party, guevaristas, castristas, Christians, atheists, socialists, social democrats, liberals, and communists came together, and what kept them united? The strength and authority of Cuauhtémock Cárdenas...’ (Ortega 2010: 18).263

To this day, the PRD still has not become internally institutionalized. As late as 2005, ‘perredista attempts to improve procedures’ remained ‘undermined by the precariousness of their achievements’ (Martínez 2005: 88). In the last decade, party leaders have continued to resolve power struggles informally, and candidate selection procedures still change regularly. On multiple occasions, the PRD has required the intervention of outside bodies to adjudicate claims of internal electoral fraud.

Yet since the late 1990s, weak routinization has posed less of a threat to the PRD’s basic integrity, given the party’s increased access to state patronage and financial resources. The party has continuously controlled the Federal District since 1997 and won over a dozen gubernatorial elections since 1998. The party has maintained a relatively strong presence in the national legislature, which, since the 1996 political reforms, has resulted in generous outlays of public funds. The PRD’s hardcore vote (voto duro), combined with the spoils that now go along with it, provide much stronger incentives against elite defection than existed during the bulk of the PRD’s formative phase. Perredistas continue to wage bitter and disorderly power struggles, but few dare to exit.

In their origins, Argentina’s FREPASO and Mexico’s PRD bear a significant resemblance. Like Mexico’s hegemonic PRI in the early 1980s, Argentina’s dominant, traditionally populist Partido Justicialista (PJ) adopted major neoliberal reforms in the late 1980s. The Carlos Menem (PJ) administration took office amid economic crisis in 1989 and quickly lowered protectionist tariffs, carried out a battery of privatizations, and implemented strict, anti-inflationary monetary policies. Menem’s economic policies provoked opposition among left-leaning PJ deputies, eight of whom defected from the party in mid-1990. For the next-half decade, this ‘Group of Eight’ (Grupo de los Ocho), in alliance with other left and center actors, created a succession of opposition fronts and parties, culminating in the formation of the Big Front (Frente Grande, or FG) in 1993 and FREPASO (Frente País Solidario) in late 1994. FREPASO quickly became Argentina’s third electoral force, behind the PJ and UCR (Unión Cívica Radical). Like Mexico’s PRD, FG/FREPASO thus originated as a left-wing, anti-neoliberal splinter group from a dominant, traditionally populist party, developed over the course of the 1990s, and became the first new party in decades to challenge the national two-party establishment.

Four years after FREPASO’s founding, an anti-Menem coalition of the UCR and FREPASO (the Alianza) placed first in the 1999 presidential and congressional elections. The Alianza’s victory ended a decade of PJ dominance and seemed to solidify FREPASO’s status as Argentina’s third major party. At the height of FREPASO’s electoral success, several scholars assumed that FREPASO would become institutionalized (Abal-Medina 1998; Novaro and Palermo 1998) and contribute to the ‘normalization’ of Argentina’s historically unstable democracy (Levitsky 2000).

Yet in 2001, FREPASO collapsed, never to be rebuilt. The immediate cause of the collapse was a congressional electoral crisis precipitated by economic calamity. The Alianza’s first year in government coincided with one of the worst economic downturns in Argentine history. The downturn, combined with a 2000 Senate corruption scandal, seriously damaged the Alianza’s public image and led FREPASO’s leader, Carlos ‘Chacho’ Álvarez, to resign the vice presidency in October of 2000. Months later, in the 2001 midterm elections, FREPASO suffered a major setback, losing sixty percent of its congressional seats. Shortly thereafter, the party dissolved.

Paradoxically, however, the root cause of FREPASO’s failure lay in the party’s unencumbered access to media and resulting organizational weakness. After breaking from the PJ in 1990, FREPASO’s founders contested six separate national elections in less than a decade. Organization-building, by consuming scarce time and resources and placing procedural and ideological constraints on elite decision-making, would have prevented FREPASO from challenging Argentina’s two-party establishment in these perpetually imminent elections. The Group of Eight began their party-building project under democracy, with full access to a vibrant, independent mass media establishment. The short-term electoral incentive to rely on media, and to bypass organization-building, was overwhelming. To maximize their prospects in perennial national elections, the Group of Eight and their allies appealed to millions of voters directly and instantaneously through press conferences, speeches, public actions, and interviews covered by the nation’s leading broadcast and print outlets. Aware of the short-term costs associated with organization-building, they eschewed base-level party development.

Thus, although media enabled FREPASO’s meteoric rise, media also prevented the party from investing in organization. Amid electoral crisis in 2000, FREPASO lacked the territorial infrastructure and activist networks necessary to regroup and rebound. With a failed brand and a nonexistent base, FREPASO collapsed. The party’s approximately two-dozen elites either joined other parties\(^2\) or retired from politics.

The chapter is organized in two sections. The first section identifies FREPASO’s access to mass media as the fundamental source of its organizational weakness and shows that FREPASO’s organizational weakness lay at the root of its 2001 collapse. The second section considers alternative explanations.

\(^2\)Many returned to the PJ. Some joined the short-lived ARI, which began as a coalition (Argentinos por una República de Iguales (est. 2000)) and briefly became a party (Afirmación para una República Igualitaria (est. 2002)).
The rise and fall of Frente Grande and FREPASO

FREPASO’s original precursor, the Group of Eight, formed in opposition to the neoliberal reforms of the first Carlos Menem (PJ) administration (1989-93). Menem assumed office in 1989 after winning Argentina’s second post-transition presidential election. The election took place amid sustained hyperinflation and recession, and the UCR – whose leader, Raúl Alfonsín, was the sitting president – suffered a comprehensive, resounding defeat. Menem defeated the UCR’s Eduardo Angeloz in a landslide, and the PJ strengthened its lead relative to the UCR in the Chamber of Deputies and Senate.

Although Menem campaigned on a traditional PJ platform, promising a major wage increase (salariazo) and other pro-labor policies, his administration rapidly implemented a spate of neoliberal reforms upon taking office. Designed to combat the crisis, these reforms included reductions in import tariffs to stimulate foreign direct investment, privatizations of numerous public industries including the national oil company (YPF), telephone service, post office, and electric, water, and gas utilities, and strict monetary policies culminating in the 1991 institution of a fixed exchange rate that pegged the Argentine peso to the US dollar (the Convertibility Plan).

Given the PJ’s historical identification with organized labor and support for public and private national industry, Menem’s reforms provoked significant backlash within left-leaning sectors of the PJ. In protest of Menem’s alianza con liberalismo (‘alliance with neoliberalism’) – as well as his administration’s ‘delegative’ governing practices and decision to pardon

4 The PJ’s assumption of power in 1989 marked Argentina’s first orderly transfer since the election of Hipólito Yrigoyen (UCR) in 1916.
5 To force through – and ensure compliance with – his controversial economic policies, the Menem administration relied heavily on ‘delegative’ governing tactics, which included court-packing and the unprecedented use of executive decrees (O’Donnell 1994)
Dirty War-era military officials—a group of eight federal deputies with roots in the Federal Capital left the PJ and formed an independent legislative bloc, the Grupo de los Ocho, or ‘Group of Eight’.

After operating on the margins of Argentine electoral politics for nearly three years, the ‘Group of Eight’ and their allies rose to national prominence in the April 1994 constituent assembly elections. Thus began the rapid ascent of the FG (est. 1993) and its successor party, FREPASO (est. 1994), which culminated in the creation of the UCR/FREPASO Alianza in 1997 and the Alianza’s victories over the PJ in the 1997 congressional elections and the 1999 presidential and congressional elections.

FREPASO, mass media access, and incentives against organization

The Group of Eight were engaged in a ‘permanent campaign’ from 1990 until the end of the 1990s. With an expanding network of allies, they competed in national elections in 1991 (legislative), 1993 (legislative), 1994 (constitutional assembly), 1995 (general), 1997 (legislative), and 1999 (general). The period from late 1993 to mid-1995 was especially

7 Chacho Álvarez, Germán Abdala, Juan Pablo Cafigero, Luis Brunati, Darío Alessandro Sr., Franco Caviglia, Moisés Fontela, and José Carlos Ramos. According to one party founder, it was not a coincidence that the PJ schism occurred in the Federal Capital: ‘Outside of the Federal Capital, no one wanted to leave the PJ. Kirchner is a great example; very similar critique of Menem, but he wanted to stay. But in the Federal Capital, we dissidents had a very low ceiling, so for us, there was an incentive to leave and contest elections outside of Peronism’ (interview with Wainfeld).

‘blurry’. Between October 1993 and April 1994, the FG went from marginal political actor to Argentina’s tercera fuerza electoral (‘third electoral force’), and between April 1994 and May 1995, the party – virtually unknown outside the Federal Capital just eighteen months earlier – mounted a serious bid for the presidency.

After splitting from the PJ, the Group of Eight first created a series of small, unsuccessful parties. The intention was to pick off PJ supporters by assaulting Menem’s economic policies and governing practices. In 1991, the Group of Eight allied with a few small opposition parties to form MODEJUSO[^10] and contest select subnational elections. Following across-the-board losses, MODEJUSO incorporated the group, Democracia Popular[^11] to form FREDEJUSO[^12] and mount a broader electoral challenge in the 1991 congressional elections. Not a single FREDEJUSO candidate prevailed in 1991. Álvarez would later describe the early 1990s as el desierto (‘the desert’) (Abal Medina 1998b: 102).

In advance of the October 1993 congressional elections, FREDEJUSO’s leaders forged a new, broader coalition called the Frente Grande (FG). The FG comprised FREDEJUSO as well as the social democratic, center-left Partido Intransigente and the Frente del Sur, a more radical, nationalist left alliance headed by filmmaker/politician, Fernando ‘Pino’ Solanas, and partially composed of dissident sectors of the Argentine Communist Party (PCA). The FG named Álvarez president, and in the 1993 congressional election, the FG outperformed expectations, electing three federal deputies: Álvarez, Solanas, and Graciela Fernández Mejide, who had joined FREDEJUSO in 1991 as a member of Democracia Popular[^13].

Despite these victories, the FG, as of late 1993, remained a marginal force at the national level. The party had achieved little success in its efforts to attract disaffected Peronist supporters. The PJ maintained a lock on most of the country’s poor and working-class vote. The UCR, in turn, commanded the support of most urban middle-class voters, in and out of the Federal Capital. Absent substantial voter realignment, the FG seemed unlikely to break five percent of the national vote.

In December of 1993, Argentine partisan alignments shifted quickly and dramatically, with favorable consequences for the FG. Six weeks after the October congressional election, the PJ and UCR forged the Olivos Pact, in which the UCR’s leader, Raúl Alfonsín, pledged to Menem that the UCR would support the PJ in amending the ‘no reelection’ clause of Argentine constitution to allow Menem to run for a second term. Olivos provoked a middle-class backlash. The Argentine public broadly supported Menem’s neoliberal reforms, viewing austerity and market liberalization as a necessary antidote to the hyperinflation and recession of the Alfonsín economy. Yet as Menem’s first term progressed, middle-class voters began to coalesce around the view that the administration’s governing tactics – corrupt deal-making, circumvention of the legislature through executive decree, court-packing – were undermining the country’s political institutions. The Olivos Pact intensified these concerns. The UCR’s tolerance of Menem’s ‘hegemonic’ pretensions and constitutional tampering produced a firestorm of opposition, especially among the UCR’s middle-class base.

The tenor of national media reflected the public’s growing concern, creating an electoral opportunity for media-savvy political entrepreneurs. The FG seized the opportunity. Although the party’s ‘romance’ with the media had begun in the wake of the 1993 midterms, it took off after Olivos. Telegenic and crisp, FG leaders took aim at the two-party establishment but directed their appeals at middle-class progressives disaffected with the UCR. The FG branded itself a ‘modern’ center-left party, primarily concerned with the middle-class valence issue of corruption. In order not to ‘turn off’ their new target constituency, FG leaders both moderated and downplayed the party’s statist, redistributive economic proposals.

The FG rose to national prominence in the April 1994 constitutional assembly election. Behind the campaign slogan, ‘A Constitution without Mafias’ the party registered a breakout performance, winning 31 of 244 constitutional assembly seats (thirteen percent). Almost overnight, the FG had become a serious national contender, validating party leaders’ strategic shift to the programmatic center.

The FG’s burgeoning voter base came primarily from the urban middle class, especially the large population of middle-class progressives in the Federal Capital. In the 1993 congressional election, the FG had received three percent of the vote nationally but almost fifteen percent 16 Interview with Wainfeld. According to one party member, Álvarez insisted on modernizing the Argentine left out of genuine conviction, not just electoral calculation. He and like-minded FG elites, the frepasista argued, believed that ‘the populist state had gangrene,’ and that the left needed to adapt to the country’s new, neoliberal era by focusing on corruption, checks and balances, and the establishment of a broad safety net within the free market context (interview with Mocca).

17 This evolving platform, writes Abal Medina (2009), ‘added up to an eclectic, centrist-oriented political discourse and created this peculiar party, which was, perhaps, a post-materialist version of the Latin American left’.

18 The economic policy preferences of the Argentine middle class reflected an emerging global consensus in support of market economics. By the 1990s, middle-class progressives had largely abandoned ‘systematic critiques of the world capitalist system’ (interview with Mocca). One FG member recalled that Álvarez refused to advance a radical economic critique of Menemism because middle-class voters did not strongly oppose Menem’s privatization and corporate tax policies (interview with Jozami). Another party member argued that only under conditions of crisis would the Argentine middle class have supported fundamental economic reform (interview with Mocca). In his view, the success of Nestor Kirchner’s left-wing economic appeals during the early 2000s illustrates this point. If Kirchner had advocated the same economic policies in a context of macroeconomic stability and growth, he stated, the public would not have supported him nearly as much as they did.

in the Federal Capital, sufficient to elect Álvarez, Solanas, and Fernández Meijide.\textsuperscript{21} In the 1994 constituent assembly elections, the FG went significantly further, ‘tak[ing] from the Radicals a significant fraction of their electoral support’.\textsuperscript{22} Twenty-five of the FG’s thirty-one successful candidates came from Buenos Aires province, and twelve from the Federal Capital alone.\textsuperscript{23}

Following the constitutional assembly election, Argentine media frequently raised the possibility of an FG/Álvarez presidential bid in 1995 (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 111). FG leaders, however, regarded a broader alliance as necessary in order to defeat the PJ in national elections. In the words of one party elite, the country’s center and left opposition remained fragmented, and the FG ‘needed to reorganize it’.\textsuperscript{24} The FG thus set about forging a series of new alliances, which eventuated in the creation of the center-left FREPASO in late 1994.

In mid-1994, José Octavio Bordón, the ex-governor of Mendoza province and a longtime centrist, Christian Democratic

\textit{peronista}, defected from the PJ, created a new party, PAIS (\textit{Política Abierta para la Integridad Social}), and allied with the FG. The FG and PAIS then allied with \textit{Unidad Socialista}, a small socialist party, and a group of ex-Christian Democrats led by Carlos Auyero. In November of 1994, this center-left electoral front became a registered party, FREPASO.\textsuperscript{25} FREPASO members coined the term ‘transversality’ (\textit{transversalidad}) to describe the ‘common cement’ (e.g., opposition to corruption) holding together the party’s heterogeneous elite networks.\textsuperscript{26}

In anticipation of the 1995 general election, FREPASO took to the airwaves, promoting anti-corruption, competent governance, and horizontal accountability through ‘efficient and intense use’ of televised speeches and press conferences, interviews with broadcast outlets and major newspapers (e.g., Clarín, La Nación), and media-tailored ‘political displays’ (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 117, 150-1).

Álvarez, in particular, was a ‘media phenomenon’, ‘charm[ing] the media with [his] irreverence toward the traditional rituals of politics, [his] ease of manner and speed’ (Abal Medina 2009: 369).

Just as FREPASO gravitated toward the media, the media – according to several unprompted interview statements – gravitated toward FREPASO. In the words of one member, television news anchors, radio hosts, and newspaper journalists ‘lived off’ the party’s charismatic, articulate leaders. FREPASO rarely had to purchase television spots. Instead, party leaders held press conferences, gave speeches, staged media displays, and the media ‘just showed up’.

FREPASO took a great leap forward in the 1995 general election, mounting a serious electoral challenge to Argentina’s two-party establishment. The Bordón/Álvarez presidential

27 In one characteristic display, FREPASO organized an initiative in which a large group collected trash on the streets of Buenos Aires and carried the trash bags to the office of the federal environmental secretary (interview with Mazzei).

28 According to one party member, FREPASO leaders did not just rely on the media for votes. They often drew their opinions from informed journalists (interview with Sigal).

29 Interview with Novaro. According to Bordón, the media simply ‘liked’ Álvarez because he was ‘from the barrio’, ‘very nice’, and left-leaning (interview with Bordón).

30 The media also may have gravitated toward FREPASO, in part, due to ideological affinity. According to several party members’ contemporaneous writings and independent, unprompted statements, FREPASO’s ideals and policies fit within the ideological parameters of the mainstream media, or media ‘establishment’. On this account, the nation’s opinion-makers – reflecting the views of the urban middle class, to which they belonged – broadly accepted the free market consensus but regarded Menem as a threat to Argentine political institutions. Given FREPASO’s economic moderation and emphasis on corruption and executive accountability, the party and the media thus made natural bedfellows.
ticket\textsuperscript{31} placed second with twenty-nine percent, and FREPASO quintupled the FG’s 1993 congressional vote share, jumping from 4.2 to 21.0 percent. FREPASO also relegated the UCR to third place in the presidential election for the first time in decades.\textsuperscript{32}

Still, FREPASO had lost to the PJ by an unexpectedly large margin.\textsuperscript{33} The party leadership thus concluded that a victory over the PJ would require an even broader alliance.\textsuperscript{34} In the lead-up to the 1997 congressional election, FREPASO took a bold step, allying with the UCR to create a broad, centrist, anti-Menem electoral coalition, the Alianza.\textsuperscript{35} The move provoked some internal controversy, as the UCR was a centrist party of the establishment that, at Olivos, had signed off on Menem’s manipulation of the constitution.\textsuperscript{36}

Yet FREPASO leaders generally agreed that the UCR and FREPASO had been dividing the middle-class PJ opposition vote for too long. They believed that it was electorally imperative, in the short term, to set aside programmatic differences, articulate common principles and programs, and work together to unseat the PJ. Following the lead previously taken by FREPASO, the Alianza branded itself a centrist coalition, principally focused on defeating Menem and restoring clean government and horizontal accountability.

The 1997 and 1999 elections marked the apex of FREPASO’s electoral trajectory. The

\textsuperscript{32}The UCR’s Horacio Massaccesi (UCR) finished a distant third, with seventeen percent of the vote. The UCR narrowly defeated FREPASO in the Chamber of Deputies, winning 21.7 percent of the vote.

\textsuperscript{33}Menem won the presidential election with fifty percent of the vote, and the PJ won the Chamber of Deputies with fifty-two percent.

\textsuperscript{34}One party member recalled the party’s surprise at Menem’s overwhelming margin of victory. In his view, the leadership believed that the party needed to create something ‘bigger’ in order to win the presidency, and this belief led to the formation of the Alianza (interview with Sigal).

\textsuperscript{35}Shorthand for the Alianza por el Trabajo, la Justicia, y la Educación (Alliance for Work, Justice, and Education).

\textsuperscript{36}One of FREPASO’s most influential voices, Christian Democrat Carlos Auyero, forcefully opposed any alliance with the UCR throughout the mid-1990s. According to one party member, FREPASO leaders only felt at liberty to create the Alianza after Auyero’s death in 1997 (interview with Mazzei).
Alianza won the 1997 congressional election with a large plurality of the vote, and in the 1999 general election, the Alianza resoundingly defeated the PJ across the board: the De la Rúa/Álvarez presidential ticket prevail[ed] and in the Chamber, the Alianza expanded its margin of victory over the PJ from 9.5 to 10.1 percent of the vote.

In summary, FREPASO rose meteorically over the second half of the 1990s by targeting post-Olivos middle-class voters with effective mass media appeals. FREPASO’s rise would have been unthinkable in the absence of mass media. Writing in 1998, party member Juan Manuel Abal Medina described mass media as the ‘primary engine’ of FREPASO’s growth, without which ‘it would be nearly impossible to explain how it could become so quickly installed in the national political arena’ (Abal Medina 2009: 369).

Investing in base-level organization would have impeded the progress of FG/FREPASO in several ways. The organization-building itself (e.g., recruiting and training activists and elites, establishing local offices and communication systems) would have diverted attention and resources while important national elections loomed on the horizon. As one party member succinctly observed: ‘There was no time to build an organization.’ Chacho Álvarez has provided the same assessment, stating in a separate interview that he and fellow party leaders could not devote energy to party organization with major elections constantly on the near horizon.

Moreover, a party organization, once built, would have impeded the party’s short-term electoral progress. First, cumbersome internal decision-making procedures would have slowed elite response time. In numerous interviews, party members and observers made clear that FREPASO’s leaders prized the capacity for rapid decision-making amid fast-changing political circumstances. One party observer recalled, for example, that Álvarez and FREPASO wanted to be able to ‘move nimbly’ (correr ligero), as contemporary politics required ‘speed’ (aceleridad). Journalists appear with a microphone, he remarked, and politicians need to say something.

37 On the strength of the UCR’s extensive territorial infrastructure, Fernando De la Rúa (UCR) defeated Graciela Fernández Meijide (FREPASO) in the Alianza’s open primary for the presidential nomination. Open primaries receive less media attention and generate lower turnout, making on-the-ground electoral mobilization more decisive. Extensive base-level organization therefore gave the UCR a massive advantage in the 1999 open primary (interviews with Wainfeld and Sigal).

The interviewee contrasted FREPASO with his own Socialist Party. The president of the Socialist Party, he stated, could not speak publicly for the party before s/he held a meeting with the membership. In contrast, Álvarez ‘just held a press conference’. Abal Medina (2009) summarizes that ‘FG leaders always fought to have freedom of action, hoping not to be tied down by institutional procedures when making decisions.... [T]he party’s nucleus...considered Álvarez’s speed of response an important requirement’. Numerous party members used the same word, lastre (burden), to capture the way FREPASO leaders, particularly Álvarez, viewed party organization.

A strong base-level organization also would have denied elites the ideological flexibility necessary to maximize short-term electoral advantage. Leftists in 1990s Argentina tended to hold views characteristic of traditional left-wing Peronism. One party member described the typical leftist during this period as ‘statist (intervencionista), populist, and anti-imperialist’. A party base composed of such individuals might have nominated unelectable candidates (Abal Medina 2009) or pressured FREPASO candidates to refuse alliances and take comparatively extreme, electorally suboptimal policy positions. These positions would have satisfied the base but alienated the much larger number of moderate, disaffected, middle-sector voters.

By restricting party decision-making to a small cadre of elites, FG/FREPASO preserved ‘extreme operational flexibility’ which enabled the party to implement the vote-maximizing strategies of coalition-building and programmatic moderation. To ensure the nomination of moderate, electable candidates, FREPASO either held open primaries (e.g., Bordon for president in 1995) or, more frequently, selected candidates through elite negotiation. FREPASO’s leadership systematically rejected radical candidacies.

There is evidence that FREPASO’s leaders, in addition to viewing party organization as an electoral encumbrance, did not recognize the potential, longer-term importance of party organization. In one party member’s formulation, the need to invest in party infrastructure ‘became, in the eyes of some party leaders...non-urgent’ (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 150) and ‘very secondary’ (bastante secundario). Another FREPASO elite asserted that rapid electoral growth ‘led [the party leadership] to think that politics was built from media success. If [the party] didn’t have neighborhood structures, it didn’t matter’ because they could still ‘mobilize people’ (convocar gente) with media appeals.

In sum, FREPASO’s leaders recognized the various short-term electoral costs associated with organization-building, and they understood that mass media appeals, unlike organization-building\textsuperscript{51} offered instantaneous visibility and the potential to achieve national success in the short term\textsuperscript{52}. Consequently, they opted to circumvent the grassroots left through direct media appeals to more moderate voters, and through ‘hypercentralized’ elite procedures for candidate selection and program articulation\textsuperscript{53}. After 1991, ‘[t]he idea of building a solid and stable party organization was never in the minds [of Álvarez and his followers]’ (Abal Medina 2009: 360).

By the end of the 1990s, FREPASO dominated the left political spectrum, but it was a tiny elite cadre with no base-level structures. According to two party members writing in 1998, ‘the FG and then FREPASO seem to have an almost ghostlike existence outside of the media arena’ (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 151). Even at its electoral apex, FREPASO’s activist base was vanishingly small, its organizational apparatus ‘practically non-existent’ (Abal Medina 2009: 364). At the end of the 1990s, FREPASO had fewer than ten paid employees (Abal Medina 2009: 363). One campaign strategist for the Alianza described FREPSAO simply: ‘There was no organization’\textsuperscript{54}

FREPASO’s electoral crisis and collapse

By the late 1990s, FREPASO members and most outside observers assumed that the party would endure and become institutionalized. In the wake of Bordón’s landslide loss in mid\textsuperscript{51}Novaro and Palermo (1998) summarize that ‘due to the recognition of the difficulty of mass mobilization...[FREPASO’s] political initiatives and electoral campaigns naturally tended to be based on the most important asset available to the party leadership: the support of journalists and access to the media’ (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 116; emphasis added).

\textsuperscript{52}‘Instead of focusing on an area like Buenos Aires City, Álvarez pushed the FG to compete nationwide’ (Abal Medina 2009: 361).

\textsuperscript{54}Interview with de Santibañes.
1995 and acrimonious exit in early 1996, Álvarez and FREPASO, explicitly unfazed, had rebounded in dramatic fashion, allying with the UCR to defeat the PJ in the 1997 congressional election. On one party member’s analysis, ‘[t]he judgment of Bordón did not take into account that the FG...was already a political organization rooted (anclada) in a large sector of the population and, consequently, capable of overcoming defeats and internal conflicts’ (Abal Medina 1998b: 105). Party members Marcos Novaro and Vicente Palermo described the ‘survival of the electoral defeat in May 1995 and of Bordón’s departure in February 1996’ as ‘proof that the Front was consolidating as a force and as a moderately institutionalized political space’ (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 129; emphasis added). They confidently referred to FREPASO’s ‘durability’, writing that ‘FREPASO does not constitute a circumstantial episode, a necessarily short-lived media phenomenon.... Neither [the rise of Duhalde in the PJ nor that of De la Rúa in the UCR] puts at risk [FREPASO’s] durability (perdurabilidad)...’ (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 137). According to some, FREPASO’s rise and apparent consolidation heralded a new era of partisan competition in Argentina. Party scholars and members, including Álvarez, argued that the Argentine party system was ‘normalizing’ (Levitsky 2000). Moving forward, they held, the once-dominant PJ would face two serious national contenders with large, stable constituencies and proven resilience.

Yet FREPASO fell as suddenly and dramatically as it had risen. Exogenous factors triggered the collapse, as the Alianza’s assumption of office coincided with the worst social and economic crisis in contemporary Argentine history. The crisis had been building for years. Despite strong aggregate growth under the Menem administration, Menem’s liberalization policies had eliminated manufacturing jobs without producing commensurate employment gains. In addition, although Menem’s public-sector reforms had shrunk parts of the budget, government spending had remained relatively high, and corruption had increased. These problems deepened in 1998 and 1999. The economy grew anemically in 1998 and contracted by four percent in 1999, producing the first recession in nearly a decade. Unemployment rose sharply, and the federal deficit spiked due to plummeting tax revenue.

Upon assuming office in December 1999, the Alianza thus inherited an economy in recession, hundreds of thousands of newly unemployed voters, and a ballooning national debt. In short order, the De la Rúa administration implemented a succession of austerity packages designed to slow the deficit spike and ensure Argentina’s continued access to IMF credit. Contrary to the government’s projections of robust growth in 2000, however, the recession persisted, partially due to the decrease in aggregate demand that resulted from federal budget cuts.

57 Unemployment continued to rise and tax revenue continued to fall, offsetting reduced spending. The Alianza now ‘owned’ Argentina’s recession and debt, creating a political crisis for the country’s new governing coalition.

The political crisis intensified in late 2000, when, amid economic and fiscal turmoil, a major corruption scandal broke, centering on allegations of bribery in the Senate. According to federal charges, eleven senators – eight from the PJ, three from the UCR – accepted payments totaling four million US dollars, conditional on their support for a 2000 labor market reform bill proposed by the Alianza.

58 Media reports alleged that the payments originated in the offices of two Alianza ministers, Intelligence Secretary Fernando de Santibañes (UCR) and Labor Secretary Alberto Flamarique (FREPASO).

The combination of economic crisis and major corruption allegations raised the Alianza’s political crisis to a fever pitch. The coalition had won power on a platform of anti-corruption.

58 By the middle of 2000, the official unemployment rate had reached fourteen percent.
Through its participation in the senate bribery scheme, the Alianza simultaneously violated its central campaign promise and rendered itself indistinguishable from Menem’s PJ on the valence issue of corruption. The scandal thus threatened to dilute and destroy the coalition’s brand (Lupu forthcoming). Absent a quick, decisive act of political atonement, the corruption scandal could sink the Alianza. Through September of 2000, Álvarez maintained public support for De la Rúa but privately urged him to fire De Santibañes and Flamarique, arguing that only drastic measures would preserve the Alianza’s credibility. De la Rúa ultimately refused, and in early October, Álvarez tendered his resignation. Announcing his resignation to the press, Álvarez stated, ‘I am very ashamed a sixteen- or seventeen-year old should feel that politics is similar to crime’.

Party members and observers generally agree that Álvarez resigned in a last-ditch effort to save FREPASO. In leaving office, he was ‘jumping out of a burning building’; the party’s future would be uncertain without Álvarez, but it would be even more uncertain absent a dramatic response to the corruption scandal. Álvarez lacked the power to expel the implicated ministers and senators. Only by stepping down could he send a sufficiently powerful signal to FREPASO’s supporters. Or so he concluded.

Following Álvarez’s resignation, Argentina’s economic and fiscal crises deepened. In November, Standard and Poor’s raised Argentina’s risk profile, and the interest rate on Argentine federal bonds spiked to sixteen percent, the second highest in Latin America. To ensure 60 In his branding theory of partisanship, Lupu (forthcoming) identifies inter-party differentiation and intra-party consistency as the two pillars of brand success. In Lupu’s scheme, the senate scandal toppled both pillars for the Alianza, diluting the coalition brand and causing electoral failure.

61 In official testimony twelve years later, Álvarez stated that during the scandal, he had ‘expected’ the removal of Flamarique and De Santibañes ‘as a political gesture’ (‘Chacho Álvarez: ‘Estaba convencido de que los sobornos existieron”, Página 12, September 13, 2012).

continued access to IMF funds, the cash-starved Alianza government implemented another round of austerity measures, culminating in a series of savage cuts in mid-2001. In July, the government slashed all public-sector salaries and pensions by thirteen percent and, in August, began to pay the salaries of high-income public-sector employees in bonds instead of cash.\(^{64}\) Aggregate demand plummeted, depressing production and leading to a sharp increase in unemployment.

As Argentine voters took to the polls for the October 2001 midterms, the economy was still contracting, and the official unemployment hovered near twenty percent.\(^{65}\) Rightly or wrongly, voters punished FREPASO, the Alianza, and the entire governing class. From 1999 to 2001, the sum of null votes, invalid votes, and votes for marginal parties and electoral vehicles leapt from 12.4 to 48.7 percent of the overall vote total, a nearly four-fold increase. While the PJ’s vote share rose marginally, from 32.3 to 35.8 percent, the Alianza’s share fell by half, from 43.7 to 22.6 percent. For FREPASO, the outcome was especially dire. The UCR lost a quarter of its congressional seats (24 of 89), but FREPASO lost roughly sixty percent (22 of 37), retaining only fifteen seats. Two months later, De la Rúa resigned amid riots, and the PJ returned to power in early January.

The message from voters was clear: the Alianza brand had failed (Lupu forthcoming). Further, unlike the UCR, which claimed a national grassroots organization and a small but committed rank-and-file membership, FREPASO depended exclusively on its brand. ‘When FREPASO lost its image’, one party member recalled, ‘it lost everything.’\(^{66}\) FREPASO lacked the territorial infrastructure necessary to regroup and rebound from its heavy midterm losses. In the wake of the election, FREPASO amounted to a cadre of two dozen elites, most in the national legislature and one, Aníbal Ibarra, in the Federal Capital's mayoral seat. It was evident that the party brand had stopped delivering, and that the electoral benefits of party membership had therefore disappeared. FREPASO’s elites jumped ship, most returning to the PJ, to smaller left parties, or to PJ satellite parties. In the words of one frepasista, ‘each [party member] returned to his home’. Reflecting on FREPASO’s collapse, one Alianza strategist invoked an old metaphor: ‘Building an image through the media is like building with mud’.

Alternative explanations of FREPASO’s collapse

So far, the chapter has argued that access to mass media lay at the root of FREPASO’s collapse. Media access weakened incentives for FREPASO to invest in organization, and the resulting organizational weakness made FREPASO fragile, ill-equipped to survive the economic/electoral crisis of 1999-2001.

One could object to this argument in two ways. First, one could object that the economic crisis of 1999-2002, not organizational weakness, fundamentally explains FREPASO’s electoral collapse. Second, one could question, on several grounds, whether FREPASO’s organizational weakness primarily resulted from party founders’ access to mass media. This section addresses both objections in turn.

The role of economic crisis in FREPASO’s collapse

One might argue that the economic crisis of 1999-2002, not FREPASO’s organizational weakness, caused FREPASO’s collapse. Yet this alternative account rests on a false choice. As Chapter One argues, and Chapters Two and Four seek to demonstrate in the cases of the PT and PRD, organizational strength and activist commitment matter precisely because they help new parties survive crisis. In general, major new parties do not fail because of crisis or organizational weakness. They fail because of the two factors combined.

Many new parties with strong organizations and cores of rank-and-file believers have withstood and rebounded from major electoral crises due to the resilience of activist networks in territorial bastions. As Chapters Two and Four show, Brazil’s PT rebounded from a disastrous election in 1982, while Mexico’s PRD rebounded from back-to-back electoral crises in 1991 and 1994. Another example, in some ways more relevant, is the UCR, FREPASO’s senior partner in the Alianza and the only party held even more responsible than FREPASO for the Argentine economic crisis. While not a new party like FREPASO, the UCR survived and recovered from the 1999-2002 crisis, evidencing the critical importance of territorial organization and committed activist networks.

The survival of the UCR

As detailed in the previous section, the UCR/FREPASO Alianza assumed power in 1999, the same year that Argentina fell off the economic precipice and entered the worst economic and social crisis in its history. High unemployment, exploding deficits, a massive and sustained economic contraction, and escalating bank runs and capital flight engulfed the new Alianza government. As the senior partner and governing party, the UCR, to an even greater extent than FREPASO, took a reputational hit due to the economic crisis. After the corralito bank freeze and subsequent riots of December 2001, which resulted in deaths and the declaration of a national state of emergency, President De la Rúa, the UCR’s standard-bearer and president of the Republic, tendered the first resignation of a post-transition Argentine president.

Yet as briefly noted earlier, there was a crucial difference between the UCR and FREPASO: the UCR claimed a territorially extensive, organized activist base, built over many decades, while FREPASO did not possess base-level activist networks. Both FREPASO and the UCR came into the 2001 election with brands, but only the UCR came in with organization – the same organization that had enabled De la Rúa to defeat Fernández Meijide handily in the Alianza’s 1999 open primary. With committed networks of Radicals dispersed across the national territory, the UCR fell back on a large base of supporters and campaigners, giving the party a low but solid national electoral floor and a continued ability to win major positions of power at the subnational level.

The UCR thus weathered the crisis. In the 2001 midterms, the Radicals only lost a quarter of their seat share and retained over a quarter of overall Chamber seats. In contrast, FREPASO lost sixty percent of its much smaller previous seat share. The UCR retained almost thirty percent of Senate seats. Subsequent elections at the subnational level provided more definitive evidence of the UCR’s post-crisis resilience. In 2003, the UCR won the governorship in Tierra del Fuego and retained governorships in Rio Negro, Chaco, Mendoza, and Catamarca. In 2005, the UCR won thirteen and eighteen percent of Chamber and Senate seats, respectively, and retained governorships in Corrientes and Santiago del Estero, bringing its total number of governorships to seven, almost a third of the national total. The UCR also held or retained over six-hundred mayoralties. In sum, the UCR remained an important, albeit diminished, national force and continued to control a significant fraction of Argentina’s provincial and municipal governments. This state of affairs has persisted to the present.
Ultimately, the question whether an organizationally stronger FREPASO would have survived the 1999-2002 economic crisis remains a hypothetical. There is little question that the economic crisis played a decisive role in FREPASO’s collapse, and that absent an electoral crisis, FREPASO would have endured in the short term. Like Chile’s PPD, FREPASO might even have become institutionalized. The PPD, the only major new left party in Chile’s post-Pinochet Concertación government, possessed a weak organization during the formative phase but did not face crisis and succeeded in becoming institutionalized.

Yet there is clear comparative evidence, from both outside (e.g., PT, PRD) and inside Argentina (e.g., the UCR), that if FREPASO had built a strong organization and activist base during the 1990s, it could have survived the 1999-2002 crisis.

The roots of FREPASO’s organizational weakness

Even if one accepts that organizational weakness played a decisive role in FREPASO’s collapse, one might question whether elite mass media access fully or even primarily accounts for FREPASO’s organizational weakness. How can we be sure that mass media access, and not some other factor/s, lay at the root of FREPASO’s organizational deficiencies?

As argued in Chapter One, politicians in power have an incentive to use the state apparatus as a substitute for party organization (Hale 2006). Since investing in parties requires elites to sacrifice resources and autonomy without the guarantee of an electoral or material return, presidents in many countries have sought to maintain their electoral clout by tapping government coffers and agencies for money and candidates and deploying bureaucratic fiefdoms to perform the campaign work often reserved for party activist networks. Yet FREPASO was out of power during the formative phase. Rapid electoral success notwithstanding, FREPASO’s founders spent the entire decade of the 1990s without executive power at the national or subnational level. Abal Medina (2009) observes that ‘[b]efore 1999, [FG/FREPASO] had no access to resources and positions within the executive branch (either at the local or national level)’ (364). Further, Menem’s neoliberal reforms shrunk federal and subnational budgets and bureaucracies, such that in the 1990s, the political system provided less money and fewer jobs than in previous decades. Consequently, FREPASO’s founders could not use state resources as a substitute for party organization, as politicians in some contexts have done. The FG and FREPASO also lacked strong ties to the economic elite.

Before 1999, FG/FREPASO’s patronage and finance thus amounted to the annual public party fund, a relatively small sum determined by parties’ share of congressional seats, and legislative office jobs, which FREPASO deputies and senators distributed primarily to party members (Abal Medina 2009: 364). In short, the resources at FG/FREPASO’s disposal were ‘far from sufficient’ to mount or sustain a national electoral challenge.

FREPASO’s origins outside Argentine power structures affected the party’s self-conception. After Bordón’s surprise exit from FREPASO in early 1996, for example, Álvarez, in a nationally televised press conference, stated that ‘we are hurt [by Bordon’s exit], but...we’re very firm, very, very firm because we are leaders who developed under adversity, outside of...’

power structures, without financial help from the big economic groups’ (emphasis added). More generally, Álvarez and other elites observed in interviews and press conferences that FREPASO’s origins in the opposition gave the party credibility as a party of principle. One FG founder, in an interview, spontaneously remarked that Álvarez deserved praise for pursuing his political ambitions outside the government, without money, resources, or connections.

The electoral triumph of the Alianza in 1999 marked FG/FREPASO’s first major executive victory, as FREPASO and its precursors previously had not elected a single governor or mayor of a major municipality (Abal Medina 1998b: 17). Two of ten Alianza cabinet appointments informally went to FREPASO. Chacho Álvarez appointed Graciela Fernández Meijide to head the Ministry of Social Development and named Alberto Flamariqé Secretary of Labor. In 2000, FREPASO’s Aníbal Ibarra won the mayorality of the Federal Capital. Also from 1999 to 2000, FREPASO elected ‘Mendoza’s deputy governor, a senator, 30 national deputies, 16 other city mayors, 71 provincial legislators and nearly 200 [municipal] councillors (Abal Medina 2009: 368). Thus, in 1999 and 2000, the founders of FG/FREPASO did gain significant access to state resources.

Yet this came nearly a decade after the Group of Eight defected from the PJ. FREPASO thus spent its formative decade in the opposition, without economic connections, and thus without access to patronage and finance. It was media access alone that weakened incentives for Chacho Álvarez and FREPASO to invest in organization.

Yet can we attribute FREPASO’s organizational deficiencies exclusively to weak incentives? Had FREPASO’s leaders invested in organization, would they have managed to build a large party apparatus with a committed activist base? If the answer is no, FREPASO’s organizational weakness would be an overdetermined outcome. One might even suppose that FREPASO’s founders chose not to pursue organization-building, at least in part, because they anticipated failure.

Chapter One argues that when elites choose to invest in party organization, two factors increase the likelihood that a strong party organization with committed activists will actually result. First, access to mobilizing structures in civil society provides the means for organization-building. Without access to external mobilizing structures, especially preexisting organizations and movements with territorial reach, large memberships, and ready-made organizational hierarchies, party-builders will find it difficult or impossible to implant local party networks in large swathes of territory. Second, periods of intense social polarization and conflict can contribute to organization-building and activist commitment by producing higher causes around which masses of individuals and groups unite and sacrifice their time, labor, and even personal well-being (Levitsky et al. n.d.).

For most of FG/FREPASO’s formative phase, party leaders maintained informal ties to left unions and Marxist, Christian Democratic, and ex-Radical networks and cadres. These groups explicitly desired inclusion in a left-wing party-building project and, jointly, claimed human and infrastructural resources on a national scale. Moreover, despite the absence of intense social polarization and conflict in 1990s Argentina, most of the individuals in these groups held deep-seeded anti-neoliberal convictions rooted in Marxist or traditional Peronist backgrounds. Their common commitment to defeating Menem very plausibly could have fueled large-scale, sustained partisan activism.

\textit{FG/FREPASO and anti-Menemist civil society}

When the Group of Eight defected from the PJ in 1990, unions were, and had long been, the PJ’s ‘core constituency’ (Gibson 1996). Relative to other traditionally labor-based parties in Latin America, the PJ succeeded in preserving strong union ties despite adopting neoliberal policies (Murillo 2001; Levitsky 2003). Still, Menem’s market and fiscal reforms provoked a significant backlash within two important, PJ-affiliated unions: the State Workers’ Association (ATE) and the Teachers’ Confederation of the Argentine Republic (CTERA). In 1991, a group of left-wing ATE leaders, including Germán Abdala, Victor De Gennaro, Claudio Lozano, and Alicia Castro, defected and formed the independent, anti-neoliberal Argentine Workers’ Confederation (CTA).\textsuperscript{75} Around the same time, the top leaders of CTERA (e.g., María Sánchez, Adriana Puiggrós, Eduardo Macaluse) and their rank-and-file supporters broke with the PJ and became forceful, public opponents of neoliberalism and Menemism. Because the CTA and CTERA possessed national infrastructures and mass memberships, an FG founder referred to them as ‘the two big ones’ (i.e., the two major anti-Menem unions) in Argentina during the 1990s.\textsuperscript{76}

The leaders of these unions expressly wished to participate in a party organization-building effort. Germán Abdala and Victor de Gennaro, leaders of the CTA, advocated the construction of a left opposition party modeled on Brazil’s labor-based Workers’ Party (PT).\textsuperscript{77} CTERA leaders favored a similar, union-based, organization-building approach.\textsuperscript{78}

\textsuperscript{75} According to one intellectual, the CTA ‘arose as [Argentina’s] most innovative union option, with the fullest answer to the crisis of traditional unions’ (interview with Mocca).

the Partido Intransigente, Frente del Sur, and ex-socialist, ex-Radical, and Christian Democratic splinter groups in FG/FREPASO possessed local infrastructures and activist bases of varying sizes (Novaro and Palermo 1998: 112-3; Castiglioni 1996), and several influential FREPASO leaders with roots in these networks urged Álvarez to use them.79

Fundamentally, these unionists and left activists/elites advocated a model of gradual, organic party development, whereby Argentina’s new partisan left would forge linkages with local civil society, nurture a strong grassroots identity, and focus on occupying espacios locales (i.e., municipal and provincial offices) while retaining the longer-term objective of national power. One left-wing member of the FG insisted that the CTA, CTERA, and the various networks of left-wing cuadros associated with FG/FREPASO had the will and joint capacity to implement the grassroots party-building model. ‘FREPASO’, he affirmed ‘could have built a strong organization’.80

The FG and FREPASO did establish informal links to Argentina’s anti-neoliberal unions. Several CTERA leaders joined FG/FREPASO, became important elites, and brought their rank-and-file supporters with them (e.g., María Sánchez, Adriana Puiggrós, Eduardo Macaluse). The FG also maintained ‘close’ informal ties to the CTA for much of the 1990s, initially through Germán Abdala, who died in 1993, and later through leader Victor de Gennaro (Abal Medina 2009: 363).

Yet by design, FG/FREPASO never solidified or formalized ties to the unions and organized left. On the contrary, throughout the 1990s, Álvarez and other party leaders deliberately and consistently kept these actors at a distance. Although leaders such as De Gennaro wanted unions to form the basis of FG/FREPASO, FG/FREPASO maintained ‘full autonomy’ from 79 Carlos Auyero and Eduardo Sigal, for example, both pressed Álvarez to incorporate Christian Democratic and ex-Socialist cuadros into the party organization and capitalize on their experience with member recruitment and activist training and education (interview with Sigal).

80 Interview with Wainfeld.
the CTA as well as CTERA (Abal Medina 2009: 365). FG/FREPASO never incorporated or established formal organizational ties to Marxist cadres and splinter networks from the UCR and Christian Democrats.

FREPASO allowed its union ties to erode completely as the party progressively tacked to the center during the second half of the 1990s. Abal Medina (1998b) notes that ‘with the party’s gradual turn to the center...the informal relations it had developed with trade unions became confrontational on several occasions’ (). For example, when Álvarez publicly expressed support for the Law of Convertibility and several Menem privatization policies, Victor De Gennaro, leader of the Argentine Workers’ Confederation (CTA), became ‘enraged’. FREPASO/CTA ties gradually weakened, and the CTA severed ties completely when FREPASO leaders, in government amid economic crisis, refused to support a round of CTA strikes (interview with Novaro). FREPASO’s informal linkages with sectors of CTERA remained strong for a longer period but also eroded after after the Alianza took office (Abal Medina 2009: 374, note 7).

In sum, throughout the formative phase, FG/FREPASO’s elite founders had access to mobilizing structures in civil society, composed of committed anti-neoliberal and anti-Menem leaders and activists, and chose not to utilize them. Had they formally incorporated the CTA, CTERA, and the aforementioned cadres/networks of Marxists, Christian Democrats, and ex-Radicals, Álvarez and other elites would have been less nimble, autonomous, and ideologically flexible and risen more slowly. At the same time, FG/FREPASO would have been able to inherit a sizable and committed rank-and-file, a large number of cuadros with political and union experience, and local infrastructure and resources (e.g., physical locales, 81 According to one FREPASO member/intellectual, both FREPASO and the CTA wanted to join forces, but De Gennaro – with the Workers’ Party model in mind – wanted unions to form the basis of FREPASO. In contrast, Álvarez wanted the unions to be ‘one more actor, a partner’ (interview with Novaro.

Although the leaders of FG/FREPASO chose not to formally incorporate left unions and sympathetic cadres and networks from left to center, these unions, cadres, and networks, by and large, supported FG/FREPASO. To be sure, they opposed FREPASO’s hypercentralization and, often more, its shift to the center. Yet the rise of meteoric rise of FG/FREPASO created a powerful incentive for them to join instead of pursuing independent party-building projects.

It should be qualified that among leftist elites and supporters of FG/FREPASO, the above objections did result in numerous defections over the course of the 1990s. Expressing a representative left-wing perspective, a party founder, left-wing journalist, and eventual defector described the party’s unwillingness to advance a ‘radical critique of Menemism’ as its ‘greatest deficiency’ (mayor carencia). In late 1994, federal deputy Fernando ‘Pino’ Solanas, one of the FG’s first three deputies, publicly charged the FG with accepting neoliberalism and, after the FG held its ground, left the party.

Numerous left-wing activists and supporters stopped supporting FREPASO during the second half of the 1990s, unwilling to positively reinforce the party’s succession of right-shifting alliances and programmatic compromises. For many, FREPASO’s creation of the Alianza in 1997 constituted a decisive and unpardonable shift to the center. A socialist and ex-frepasista recalled, for example, that he and other left activists ‘held their noses’ (tragamos sapos) and supported FREPASO through 1995 and 1996 but, in good conscience, could no longer do so after the formation of the Alianza. A radical FG/FREPASO elite cited programmatic dilution as the central grievance of other radical elites and supporters, and the one that ultimately led to his own and others’ departure in the late 1990s.

Still, most of the Argentine left, for most of FG/FREPASO’s electoral run, rode on the bandwagon. Although left-wing party leaders, unionists, activists, and voters objected to FG/FREPASO’s diluted policies and closed elite structure, they possessed very little independent electoral support and, consequently, would have become politically irrelevant if they had joined ‘purer’ left parties or pursued party-building independently. Only the most committed, doctrinaire leftists would support electorally marginal left alternatives and, in effect, simply cede left vote share to the ascendant FREPASO.

FREPASO’s leaders recognized and took advantage of their leverage. On occasion, they even publicly reminded left-wing members and outside left critics that FG/FREPASO, with its large and growing middle-class support base, did not need the radical left to succeed. One FG/FREPASO member recalled a 1994 television interview in which Chacho Álvarez, asked for a reaction to radical internal critiques, stated: ‘Either they change [their views], or they leave’ (‘O cambian o se van’). ‘He didn’t even hold a meeting’, the party member recalled. Despite serious objections, from internal and external left elements, to FG/FREPASO’s programmatic moderation, broad coalition-building, and underinvestment in the grassroots, ‘still, where Álvarez went, everyone went.... All the public opinion, all the media, and many [on the left] followed him’. By the time leftists started defecting from FREPASO in large numbers (1999-2001), the support of the Argentine left was the least of FREPASO’s concerns.

In sum, FREPASO founders chose not to incorporate sympathetic actors in civil and political society, but these actors supported FG/FREPASO. Thus, not only did access to media eliminate incentives for FREPASO to invest in organization, FREPASO’s meteoric, media-fueled ascent, through bandwagon effects, proved inimical to the formation of an organizationally strong left alternative in 1990s Argentina. In this way, the media-based rise of FREPASO contributed decisively to the broad failure of left party organization-building in 1990s Argentina.
Collapse by Schism: The Case of Peru’s United Left

In late 1980, several months after Peru’s transition to democracy, seven left-wing Peruvian parties joined in an electoral coalition, the Izquierda Unida (IU). On creation, the IU inherited a territorially extensive network of local branches and activist cadres from its constituent parties. On the strength of left unity, base-level organization, and leaders’ charisma, the IU rapidly became a serious contender for national power. In 1983, IU leader Alfonso Barrantes won the Lima mayoralty, Peru’s second most important elected office. In 1985, Barrantes placed second in the presidential election, and IU candidates won a quarter of the seats in Peru’s Chamber of Deputies.

Yet unlike several mass-based new left successes\(^1\), the IU never cohered. Despite top-down efforts to meld the coalition’s heterogeneous networks into a single party organization, the IU, throughout the 1980s, remained a loosely knit alliance held together by a broad, vague leftism – the coalition’s only ideological common denominator – and, crucially, the shared perception that national electoral success required left unity.

As the first chapter argues, new parties and coalitions typically lack solid brands and the cohesion that such brands provide. Consequently, to the extent that a party’s initial unity depends on electoral incentives or patronage, it will be vulnerable to schism and collapse, as electoral calculations and incentives may change, and patronage resources may abruptly ‘dry up’. For new parties, cohesion comes from non-material sources, which supplement electoral incentives for cooperation and, in the case of mass-based parties, counteract the centrifugal forces associated with internal heterogeneity.

The IU did not have any such sources of cohesion. Unlike Mexico’s PRD and El Salvador’s FMLN, the IU’s heterogeneous actors did not become more politically united due to shared

\(^1\)Uruguay’s FA, Brazil’s PT, Mexico’s PRD, Nicaragua’s FSLN, El Salvador’s FMLN.
Moreover, the IU did not have a leader with strong crossfational ties, which can be ‘indispensable’ for unity in heterogeneous, mass-based parties and coalitions (Ansell and Fish 1999). Consequently, within the IU, coalition affiliation and cooperation never trumped constituent party attachments, personal loyalties, or other organizational subidentities.

In late 1989, a moderate faction of the IU, which included Barrantes, concluded that Barrantes did not need the coalition in order to mount a competitive presidential bid. When Barrantes and his allies reached this view, the IU lost its main source of cohesion: the shared perception among all key coalition players that electoral success required a united left. Barrantes defected and launched a highly unsuccessful independent campaign for the presidency. Henry Pease, who replaced Barrantes as the IU’s presidential candidate, also fared poorly in the 1990 election, garnering less than ten percent of the vote. Chastened by their defeat, and electorally marginal without Barrantes, the IU leadership disbanded, and the coalition collapsed.

The chapter is organized in three sections. The first sets the stage for the analysis, detailing the transformations in mass civil society that occurred during the military-authoritarian period (1968-80) and describing the transition to democracy and creation of the IU in 1980. The second section summarizes the IU’s rise and collapse over the course of the 1980s. The third section argues that weak sources of cohesion lay at the root of the IU’s collapse. Despite inheriting a strong base-level organization from its constituent parties, the IU lacked a unifying foundation (e.g., a shared history of systematic repression, a leader with crossfational ties) that might have counteracted internal centrifugal forces.

\[2\] Although the IU’s constituent parties and most of the coalition’s main elites actively participated in the anti-regime struggles of the late 1970s, the Morales Bermúdez regime did not carry out systematic repression against the left – or other opponents. The IU did suffer systematic violence at the hands of the Sendero Luminoso during the 1980s, but – as the chapter’s final section will detail – this violence did not generate cohesion in the coalition.
Left-wing military rule, democratization and the creation of Izquierda Unida

Under the military governments of Juan Velasco (1968-75) and Francisco Morales Bermúdez (1975-80), Peru experienced an unprecedented increase in the organizational scope, horizontal coordination, and radicalization of the popular classes, from urban workers and peasants to the rapidly expanding informal sector. A heterogeneous set of Marxist parties played a central role in this grassroots effervescence, both as ‘instigators and beneficiaries’ (Roberts 1998: ). By the end of the 1970s, several of the country’s Marxist parties had developed powerful party organizations, with skilled, disciplined core memberships and organic ties to the popular sector associations that had expanded and radicalized during the military era. When the Marxist left united months after the 1980 democratic transition, the resulting coalition, Izquierda Unida, possessed one of the largest, most ideological, and most societally rooted organizational bases in Latin America.

Popular sector mobilization under the Velasco regime (1968-75)

From 1968 to the mid-1970s, Peru’s left-wing military regime, headed by General Juan Velasco Alvarado, carried out a set of pathbreaking reforms, with long-term consequences for the country’s economy and civil society. Statist, redistributive, and nationalist, the Velasco regime expropriated and nationalized a slew of foreign multinational companies, including all major producers/exporters of primary commodities (e.g., petroleum, steel, minerals, fish). The regime also nationalized the banking and airline sectors. To protect domestic industry from foreign competition, the regime erected trade barriers and tightly restricted the inflow of foreign capital and investment. Finally, the regime ‘[broke] the back of oligarchic power’ in Peru (Roberts 1998: 215), seizing most of the country’s largest rural estates and redist... tributing nearly ten-million hectares of land to roughly 300,000 peasant families (La Serna 2010). By the early 1970s, the Velasco regime had expropriated more property than all its Latin American contemporaries, save the Cuban revolutionary regime.

To ensure the consolidation of its reforms, the Velasco regime also set about organizing the popular sectors, from labor and the peasantry to informal urban workers, in a new, progressive associational structure. For decades, the traditionally populist APRA had opposed left-wing reform and maintained union support through co-optation and clientelism. The Velasco regime sought to usher in a new period of labor corporatism in which urban and rural unions would cooperate with the government in the service of a left-wing, state-led developmental agenda. The regime actively promoted the formation, legal recognition, and expansion of ‘parallel’, non-aprista unions, offering inducements such as collective bargaining rights, employment guarantees, and subsidies (Collier and Collier...).

These efforts quickly reaped dividends. Progressive unions in the agricultural, mining, industrial, and service sectors expanded and proliferated during Velasco’s initial years in office. By 1972, the main confederation of non-aprista urban working-class unions, the General Peruvian Workers’ Confederation (CGTP) had surpassed the aprista Peruvian Workers’ Confederation (CTP) as Peru’s largest trade association (Roberts 1998, pp. 210, 215).

After progressive popular sector unions and associations began to enter the opposition... the Velasco regime, increasingly dominated by reactionary elements, redirected legal and financial inducements to a second set of independent union confederations, spanning the industrial (CTRP), educational (SERP), and agricultural (CNA) sectors. Although conceived as moderate, state-allied counterweights to the CGTP (urban working class), SUTEP (teachers), and CCP (peasants), these confederations did not weaken or neutralize the growing progressive union opposition. Consequently, the Velasco regime’s second unionization initiative achieved little save another increase in the scope of Peruvian labor organization.

The Velasco regime also promoted new forms of popular organization in Peru’s informal sector (Cameron 1994; Stokes 1991). Heavy industrialization and urbanization throughout the middle of the 20th century had given rise to a massive rural-urban exodus and concomitant explosion of informal poor on Peru’s urban peripheries. Between 1940 and 1984, the population of shantytowns (pueblos jovenes) outside Lima proper, for example, increased nearly twentyfold, from 120,000 to over two million (Roberts 1998: 212). Through financial and other means, the Velasco regime stimulated the creation of new, non-aprista neighborhood associations in Peru’s urban peripheral communities, causing these associations to spike in number and size during the late 1960s and early 1970s.

In addition to their direct consequences on income distribution and civil society, Velasco’s policies had a crucial indirect effect: to strengthen Peru’s partisan left. Peru’s left parties took the lead role in organizing and mobilizing many of the non-aprista popular sector associations favored by the Velasco regime (e.g., the CGTP, SUTEP, CCP). Moreover, when left parties did not do the ‘instigating’, they still benefited from the regime’s independent

aprista popular civil society organizations provided fertile terrain for the recruitment of party cuadros and the development of new grassroots linkages.

The relevant left parties belonged to four informal, competing categories: (1) The Peruvian Communist Party (PCP), aligned with the Soviet Union and closely linked to the CGTP; (2) The Union of the Revolutionary Left (UNIR), controlled by the PC del P-
Patria Roja
(henceforth Patria Roja), a Maoist PCP splinter party dominant within Peru’s largest teachers’ union, SUTEP, and also linked to certain peasant organizations (Cameron 1994: ); (3) Trotskyist parties, primarily FOCEP and APS, with ties to the more radical sectors of Peru’s organized labor and peasant classes (Roberts 1998: 204-9); and (4) A group of more recently formed and internally diverse parties, including (a) the Revolutionary Vanguard (VR, est. 1965) a heterogeneous Marxist party linked to the Peruvian Peasant Confederation (CCP)[12] neighborhood associations, and key primary-sector unions, especially the ‘powerful miners’ union’ (Cameron 1994: 28); (b) the Revolutionary Leftist Movement (MIR, est. 1962); and (c) several smaller radical parties active in the shantytowns of Lima and other major Peruvian cities (e.g., Arequipa).

Popular sector coordination and radicalization under the Morales Bermúdez regime (1975-80)

Although not by design, the policies of the Morales Bermúdez successor military regime helped unify and radicalize many of the grassroots forces unleashed under Velasco. In mid-1975, amid a protracted economic downturn and with Velasco’s health in decline, General Francisco Morales Bermúdez and a group of fellow market-oriented, democratizing reformers staged a coup and assumed power. To combat the economic crisis, the Morales Bermúdez regime quickly implemented IMF-stipulated austerity measures and halted or rolled back hallmark Velasco-era social and economic reforms. The Peruvian economy continued to falter, however, with aggregate growth in 1975 and 1976 ranging from negative to anemic.

The combination of unpopular policy reversals, austerity, and the persistence of economic stagnation brought social unrest to crisis levels in 1977 and 1978. Although union opposition to the military regime had gathered some steam under Velasco\textsuperscript{13} union/military relations became openly ‘antagonistic’ under Morales Bermúdez (Collier 1999: 116). Organized popular opposition culminated in a set of five general strikes (paros generales)\textsuperscript{14} beginning in July of 1977 and lasting until the 1980 transition. The CGTP and Communist Party (PCP) led the strikes, supported by a set of smaller, more radical unions and parties (Roberts 1998: 210-11).

Peru’s striking urban unions acted as the ‘fulcrum’ of a broader radicalization in popular civil society, which encompassed the country’s peasantry and ballooning informal sector (Roberts 1998: 214). Although Velasco’s agrarian reform had delivered a virtual ‘death blow’ to Peru’s landed oligarchy and redistributed land to hundreds of thousands of peasants in the country’s coastal highlands, more than eighty percent of Peruvian peasants – the vast majority located outside the coastal highlands – continued to operate as ‘landless temporary workers’ (McClintock 1981: 63). Thus, under Morales Bermúdez, peasant land claims and grievances remained largely unaddressed, providing ‘fertile social terrain’ for continued radicalizing efforts on the part of Peru’s peasant-oriented Marxist parties (e.g., the VR).

Simultaneously, Peru’s still rapidly expanding informal sector began to reverse its longstanding vertical dependence on the state, becoming more organized at the base level, horizontally integrated, and militant. Although nonclientelistic shantytown organizations had expanded and proliferated under the Velasco regime, the vertical structure of informal sector interest representation persisted due to Velasco’s corporatist policies, which tied neighborhood associations to the state through SINAMOS and other mediating bodies. Under Morales Bermúdez, Peru’s mushrooming urban periphery became a central arena – the central arena in some cases (PARTY NAMES NEEDED) – for left party consciousness-raising and anti-regime mobilization. In the late 1970s, left parties unified hundreds of local shantytown associations, pressing them to act as a unified sector, and radicalized them, exhorting them to beef up their material demands and reject any government restrictions on their independence. The oppositional character of Peru’s neighborhood associations intensified as the Morales Bermúdez presidency progressed, and the twin scourges of recession and austerity exacerbated living conditions on Peru’s urban periphery.

Democratization and the creation of Izquierda Unida

The Morales Bermúdez regime did not employ heavy repression in order to quell or discourage dissent. Throughout the contentious late 1970s, the regime did not murder a single member of the political opposition or resort to forms of systematic soft repression such as mass arrest or exile. Authoritarian ‘hostility’ to Peru’s organized popular sectors took the form of anti-union economic and labor policies, mass political firings and blanket strike bans in response to the paros generales and select expulsions of radical left leaders, such as that of 15 Before the military-authoritarian period, these associations had pursued access to basic public services (e.g., water, sewage, electricity) through one-on-one relationships with relevant state agencies and public (often aprista) officials.

16 Even the comparatively soft bureaucratic-authoritarian regimes of Brazil (1964-85) and Uruguay (1971-83) arrested and exiled thousands of political opponents.

17 The Morales Bermúdez regime reversed employment security guarantees, eliminated industrial cooperatives, and placed restrictions on unionization and collective bargaining (Roberts 1998: 243).

VR leader Javier Diez Canseco. One moderate IU member and scholar emphasized that even at the height of Peru’s social unrest in the late 1970s, the Morales Bermúdez government exiled very few individuals and did not close a single university.\(^{19}\)

Far from crushing the opposition, the Morales Bermúdez regime responded to the anti-regime mobilizations of the late 1970s by accelerating the process of political liberalization.\(^{20}\) Military officials set a constituent assembly election for June of 1978, to be followed by presidential and congressional elections in early 1980. In the 1978 constituent assembly elections, conflicts over program and candidacies prevented left-wing electoral unity. Five separate left parties/coalitions competed and, riding the wave of anti-regime popular mobilization, fared well in collective terms, jointly winning thirty percent of the assembly seats.

By 1980, however, full democratization loomed on the immediate horizon, causing popular mobilization and public discontent to taper off and therefore weakening electoral prospects for the left. Meanwhile, conflicts over program and candidacies continued to prevent left unity. In the April 1980 general election, which marked Peru’s full transition to democracy, Peru’s fragmented left parties suffered a significant setback, jointly winning only fourteen percent of the Chamber seats. In the presidential contest, CCP peasant leader Hugo Blanco, the top left-wing candidate (among several), placed a distant fourth with four percent of the vote.\(^{21}\)

The left’s 1980 setback led directly to the creation of the United Left. Faced with the prospect of political marginality in Peru’s nascent democracy, and with key municipal elections – including, crucially, the Lima mayoral race – set for November of the same year, most of Peru’s major left parties joined in an electoral coalition, the Izquierda Unida, to contest national power. Only Hugo Blanco and his Trotskyist Revolutionary Workers’ Party (PRT) opted not to join.²² Although the IU’s parties disagreed on a range of strategic and policy-related questions, they shared a basic democratic, left-wing orientation. In different ways, and to varying degrees, they all sought to reduce poverty and inequality by working within Peru’s democratic system.

The IU’s constituent parties numbered seven in total: the PCP; UNIR, dominated by Patria Roja; Popular Democratic Unity (UDP), which primarily consisted of the VR and MIR and would later form the basis of PUM (est. 1984)²³ the Revolutionary Communist Party (PCR), a VR splinter; FOCEP; APS; and the velasquista Revolutionary Socialist Party (PSR) (Roberts 1998: 223).²⁴ Several left-wing Christian elites led by Henry Pease and Rolando Ames also joined the coalition.

Organizational inheritance and the IU’s mass base

To a greater extent than most new grassroots parties in Latin America, the IU was born with a strong base-level party organization (or, more precisely, set of party organizations). Whereas Uruguay’s Broad Front (FA), Brazil’s PT, Mexico’s PRD, and El Salvador’s FMLN all drew heavily from civil society and other preexisting structures in order to develop their party organizations,²⁵ the IU simply agglomerated preexisting parties. Several of the IU’s constituent parties (PCP, Patria Roja, UDP (later PUM)) had large organizational bases. In

²² In the late 1980s, the IU’s PUM absorbed much of the PRT.

²⁴ The PSR consisted mainly of former Velasco-regime military officials and technocrats.

²⁵ The FA built on urban unions, the PT on industrial unions and Catholic grassroots communities, the FMLN on a powerful guerrilla organization, and the PRD on neighborhood organizations and rural unions. (The PRD also drew heavily from preexisting PRI networks and the Mexican Socialist Party. In this respect, its grassroots development more closely resembles the IU’s. For details on the PRD, see Chapter Four.) coalition, they boasted a sizable collective membership and territorially extensive network of local party structures.\textsuperscript{26} Moreover, unlike the movements and civil society organizations that anchored Latin America’s other new left parties, the IU’s constituent parties did not have to redirect members and resources (i.e., to ‘feed’ in) to a new, separate political organization. Instead, the IU, on creation, inherited a sprawling army of ready-made party activists, many with decades of experience, organized in disparate networks across the Peruvian territory.\textsuperscript{27}

Although precise membership counts do not exist, one coalition elite – without specifying the date – estimated the constituent parties’ total membership at 25,000,\textsuperscript{28} with UNIR (overwhelmingly \textit{Patria Roja}) counting 8000 members, the PCP 6000, the UDP/PUM (VR, MIR) 6000, the PCR 2000, the PSR 2000, and FOCEP 1000.\textsuperscript{29} Two party members – one an elite in the independent bloc, the other a UDP/PUM activist and intellectual – provided higher estimates of approximately 50,000.

For several reasons, these membership figures understate the organizational strength of the IU. First, the IU quickly acquired tens of thousands of additional \textit{de facto} members: active, core supporters who lacked partisan affiliation (the \textit{no partidarizados}). Only in 1989 would the IU attempt to incorporate these individuals formally through a mass recruitment drive. In the drive, the coalition leadership registered and distributed IU cards (\textit{carnetes}) to 150,000 individuals, ‘no more than 50,000’ of whom belonged to the IU’s constituent parties.\textsuperscript{30} Given Peru’s population size at the end of the 1980s (approximately 20 million), the 150,000 member figure indicates that the IU, nine years after formation, had a member/population ratio of nearly one percent. In proportional terms, this places the IU between Brazil’s PT and Mexico’s PRD on a comparable timeline.\footnote{31\textsuperscript{}}

\begin{footnotesize}

Second, the IU’s main constituent parties – PCP, Patria Roja, PUM (VR/MIR) – were ‘exclusive’, explicitly vanguardist organizations composed of disciplined, skilled operatives (Roberts 1998: ).\footnote{32\textsuperscript{}} Influenced by ‘the foquismo of the 1960s’, they recruited selectively, incorporating individuals – ‘largely...intellectuals and labor or student activists’ (Roberts 1998: 228) – with demonstrated ideological commitment, high levels of political education, and/or proven ability to mobilize popular sectors, train cuadros, etc. As a result, the typical IU constituent party member/branch possessed a higher capacity for political mobilization and a more single-minded commitment to political activism than the typical member/branch of most major parties in Latin America, new and old, enduring and short-lived.

Third, due to constituent party linkages with the movements and sectoral associations that had blossomed under military rule, the IU had an exceptionally strong civil society ‘periphery’. Seawright (2012), for example, uses ample survey evidence to demonstrate that local IU party leaders in 1980 and 1985 had stronger ties to civil society organizations than local leaders in Venezuela’s AD and COPEI, Argentina’s PJ and UCR, and Peru’s APRA and Acción Popular (PA) – all parties with deep societal roots, at least historically.\footnote{33\textsuperscript{}}

\footnotetext{31\textsuperscript{}}The PT was smaller (Chapter Four), the PRD larger (Chapter Five).

\footnotetext{32\textsuperscript{}}The smaller parties – APS, FOCEP, PCR, PSR – ‘were little more than political vehicles for a prominent personality’ (Roberts 1998: 228).

\footnotetext{33\textsuperscript{}}To measure civil society linkages, Seawright asked a representative sample of party leaders to detail their organizational memberships, donations, and meeting attendances in particular years.
From the beginning, the IU’s constituent parties belonged to two informal factions, sometimes called the reformist and revolutionary blocs (Cameron 1994). The reformist bloc, comprising the PCP, PCR, and PSR, prioritized winning elections and using elected office to raise taxes on the wealthy, increase social transfers and public services, and implement statist, pro-labor economic policies. Leaders of the revolutionary bloc, comprising the VR and MIR (later the PUM), UNIR, FOCEP, and APS, tended to regard electoral success as important but secondary to popular mobilization and the pursuit of radical change by extraelectoral – though non-violent – means (e.g., strikes, mass protests).

The IU’s third main faction, the ‘independent’ (Cameron 1994) or ‘neutral’ (Roberts 1998) bloc, consisted of elites – led by left Christians Henry Pease and Rolando Ames (Roberts 1998: 254) – who lacked constituent party affiliations and organizational bases, tended toward reformist (as opposed to revolutionary) ideological positions, but remained separate from the reformist bloc in order to promote coalition integrity ‘by playing a leadership role’ and developing internally democratic decision-making and conflict settlement procedures.

34 Others use the terms ‘pragmatists’ and revolutionaries (Seawright 2012) or ‘moderates’ and ‘radicals’ (Roberts 1998).

35 ‘The revolutionary Left positioned itself in opposition to both the repression of the armed forces and the terrorist violence of the Shining Path’ (Cameron 1994: 26; emphasis added). As will be discussed below, radical sectors of the PUM (los libios) and allied parties developed a small, armed organization toward the end of the 1980s.

36 Cameron (1994) writes that for parties in the revolutionary bloc, ‘winning elections was secondary to controlling the United Left coalition and turning it into a ‘genuine mass front’ to seize power through class struggle’ (78). According to Roberts (1998), leaders of the PUM – the strongest party in the revolutionary bloc – believed that the radical left ‘had to develop a more pragmatic, short-range political and economic program with concrete tasks and realistic goals, even if the ultimate objectives and the teleological vision of socialist revolution remained intact’ (Roberts 1998: 229). In a La República interview nearly a decade after the democratic transition and the IU’s formation, Jorge Hurtado Pozo (a.k.a. ‘Ludovico’), a top leader in Patria Roja, stated that ‘elections should not be the priority; it is necessary to mobilize the struggle of the workers’ (La República, June 29, 1989, cited in Cameron 1994: 93).

37 The independent bloc had greater ideological affinity for the reformists. But its members were also
Although the revolutionary bloc ‘controlled the strongest party machines’ in the IU (Cameron 1994: 228), none of the coalition’s blocs possessed broad-based, national electoral appeal. The independent elites did not have national constituencies, and the revolutionary and reformist parties, while capable of mobilizing affiliated civil society organizations, had ‘[limited] popularity with the broader electorate’ (Cameron 1994: 79). Roberts (1998) observes that ‘[a]fter years of semiclandestine struggle, most of the leaders of the Left were not widely recognized as public figures, and they did not have the organizational, financial, or human resources required to mobilize electoral support on a national scale’ (Roberts 1998, p. 228).

In advance of the 1980 municipal elections, leaders of the three blocs, by consensus, designated left independent Alfonso Barrantes – a former aprista and labor lawyer with socialist roots – as the coalition’s president and candidate for the Lima mayoralty. Barrantes proved an acceptable compromise choice for two reasons. First, his leadership and presence atop the IU ticket brightened the coalition’s national electoral prospects. With his ‘common touch and popular appeal’, Barrantes could ‘attract electoral support that far surpassed that of the organized constituencies of the left parties’, particularly among the ‘floating, lower-class mass electorate’ (Roberts 1998: 248).

Second, and crucially, Barrantes’ ‘political independence...enabled him to be a consensus figure’ (Roberts 1998: 248; emphasis added). Barrantes did not belong to any of the IU’s constituent parties or have an organizational base of his own. His assumption of leadership committed to playing a leadership role in the IU, strengthening internal democracy, and avoiding division' (Cameron 1994: 79).

38 Although the 1960s and 1970s had seen a major increase in the scope of organized, mass-based civil society, the electoral preferences of the urban informal poor, who generally ‘lacked any stable partisan or ideological identity’, determined most major national elections (Roberts 1998: 248). The partisan left had made inroads in Peru’s urban peripheral communities, especially during the late 1970s, but the IU’s organizational roots among the amorphous, ‘floating, lower-class mass electorate’ remained fragmented and circumscribed (Roberts 1998: 248). The heterogeneous, atomized informal sector posed inherent challenges for horizontal coordination (Cross 1998), and the members of this large class tended to hold relatively conservative views (Cameron 1994).
would not tilt the organizational balance of power within the IU against any of the coalition’s main parties. Thus, the coalition’s leading caudillos in the revolutionary and reformist blocs (e.g., Javier Diez Canseco (VR, PUM), Alberto Moreno (UNIR, Patria Roja), Jorge del Prado (PCP)) were willing to back him.

The IU’s rise and fall

The combination of left unity under the IU banner and Barrantes’ presence at the coalition’s helm reaped immediate electoral dividends. In the November 1980 municipal election, Barrantes placed second in the Lima mayoral race, and the IU won thirteen of Peru’s 188 mayoralties, nine in the pueblos jóvenes encircling the Lima metropolitan area (Roberts 1998: 223). Yet the election only marked the beginning of the IU’s rapid rise. As voters cast their ballots in late 1980, Peru stood on the brink of radical social and economic changes that would enable the IU to build quickly on its initial gains and, in a few short years, contend seriously for national power.

Economic crisis and civil war gripped Peru in the earliest stages of its new democracy. From 1980 to 1983, economic conditions in the country deteriorated, culminating in a severe bout of stagflation. In 1983, national income contracted by over ten percent, while inflation more than doubled. During the same period, violent terror swept through the Peruvian countryside. In early 1980, the Maoist guerrilla organization, the Shining Path, emerged and declared war on Peru’s democratic regime, from the coercive apparatus that secured it to the political class that participated in it. In just a few years, the Shining Path – and, 39 In Roberts’ (1998) formulation, Barrantes’ independence ‘shielded the coalition’s presidency from intramural partisan squabbles and prevented any single party from exercising hegemony within the coalition’ (248).

40 The Shining Path originated as a small, Ayacucho-based Maoist party, the PCP-Sendero Luminoso. In early 1980, the PCP-SL created a guerrilla organization and launched its armed struggle.
secondarily, the MRTA—inflicted thousands of casualties, many terroristic in nature on army and police, military-backed armed peasant groups (rondas), and local political activists and leaders. The Sendero also expanded well beyond its original Ayacucho base, establishing a strong, active presence in several neighboring departments (e.g., Huancavelica, Apurmac). Predictably, the political opposition benefited from the Belaúnde administration’s (AP) government’s weak economic performance and apparent inability to stem Sendero’s tide. In the 1983 municipal elections, voters harshly rebuked the president’s center-right Popular Action (AP), APRA’s traditional competitor and Peru’s only other institutionalized national party. In the final tallies, APRA and the IU eclipsed AP, relegating it to a distant third. Although APRA emerged the overall victor, the IU finished a close second, with almost thirty percent of the nationwide municipal vote total. The IU won thirty-three mayoralties, and Barrantes was elected mayor of Lima, an office second only to the presidency in power and prestige.

Between the 1983 municipal and 1985 general elections, acute stagflation gave way to anemic growth, and the civil war intensified. The military beefed up its counter-insurgency efforts, while the Sendero continued to commit large-scale murder and occupy new swathes of rural territory. As in 1983, the dual problems of economic weakness and violent turmoil favored non-incumbents in the 1985 general election. The IU consolidated its status as a major electoral force, winning nearly a quarter (twenty-four percent) of the seats in Peru’s Chamber of Deputies. Barrantes placed second in the presidential contest with twenty-one percent of the vote, losing to APRA’s Alán García. The general election, Peru’s second since the 1980 transition, marked the apex of the IU’s trajectory. Less than five years after formation, the

Beyond general anti-incumbent effects, the IU’s rapid rise from 1980 to 1985 stemmed from four factors. First, left unity increased support among left-leaning voters. With the left in broad coalition, ideologically sympathetic voters no longer considered it a ‘waste’ to vote for the partisan left, unlike in previous eras characterized by left fragmentation. Second, Barrantes’ external appeal broadened the IU’s electoral base, particularly among the informal poor (Roberts 1998: 248). Third, the IU had begun to develop a modestly successful brand in the broader electorate through the local grassroots work of its activists and the innovative municipal governance strategies of its mayors (especially the strategy of autogestión, or community self-management, implemented in Lima shantytowns such as Villa El Salvador). Fourth, and crucially, the IU’s organizational strength gave the coalition a major advantage in the electoral ‘ground game’. To a degree rivaled only by apristas, IU candidates across the country could draw on activist networks, both independent and constituent party-affiliated, to wage effective ground campaigns.

Remarkably, however, after the April 1985 general election, Barrantes and the IU participated jointly in only one more electoral cycle: the November 1986 municipal elections. In this cycle, IU candidates for mayor and municipal councilor fared relatively well in the country’s secondary and tertiary cities, but Barrantes, a mere eighteen months after almost winning the presidential election, lost his reelection bid for the Lima mayoralty.

44 The fragmentation and marginality of left parties had caused left-leaning voters to abstain or support centrist candidates who, unlike any individual left party, stood a reasonable chance of winning.

45 For a theoretical discussion of party brand formation, see the introductory sections of Lupu (n.d.). See Samuels (n.d.) and Holland (n.d.) for more specific discussions of how local grassroots activity (Samuels) and effective subnational governance (Holland) enable parties to establish brands.

economic factors, which benefited APRA at the IU’s expense, and Barrantes’ imprudent detachment from his own campaign. Peruvian GDP skyrocketed from 2.3 percent in 1985 to 9.2 percent in 1986, following the implementation of heterodox economic reforms by the recently inaugurated, left-tacking Alán García (APRA) administration. The positive short-term effects of these economic reforms increased the popularity of García and APRA, at the IU’s electoral expense. APRA’s successful shift to the left ‘crowded’ the IU, rendering the coalition’s program less distinctive within the Peruvian party system and thus partially diluting the IU brand.

Coalition members have also faulted Barrantes himself, who – in their telling – opted not to participate in his own reelection campaign, except at the ‘final hour’. On one insider’s account, Barrantes wrongly believed that Alán García would support his candidacy, not that of fellow aprista Jorge del Castillo, and that he would coast to victory as a result. Only on the day of the election, when it had become clear that García would remain ‘on the fence’ publicly, and that Barrantes trailed in the initial tallies, did Barrantes lead a series of belated campaign rallies. Jorge del Castillo prevailed by a three-percent margin. Reflecting on Barrantes’ loss, the same insider quoted above simply rued: ‘No hizo campaña’ (‘[Barrantes] did not campaign’).

In fact, Barrantes’ politically costly behavior in the 1986 Lima mayoral campaign was not a random event. His behavior formed part of a pattern and stemmed from a deeper problem in the IU: the tenuous and weakening state of his relationships with the coalition’s key secondary leaders. Since the IU’s creation in 1980, Barrantes, as president, had not played an integrative role or engaged heavily in internal affairs. He had frequently missed CDN meetings, for example, and kept face-to-face meetings with secondary elites to a minimum. During the 1983 and 1985 electoral seasons, the relatively moderate Barrantes had unilaterally dismissed programmatic demands from the IU’s revolutionary bloc, informally circumventing the CDN’s consensus requirement on the (correct) assumption that revolutionary leaders would not defect for electoral reasons.

After the 1985 general election, these dynamics intensified. In the lead-up to the 1986 municipal elections, the revolutionary PUM, UNIR, and FOCEP – joined by the historically reformist PSR – demanded that the CDN approve a set of programmatic guidelines before electing the IU’s candidate. Barrantes bristled at the demand and ‘threatened’ not to run (Herrera 2002: 318), whereupon journalistic rumors abounded that the CDN would elect independent Henry Pease instead of Barrantes. Although Pease ‘dismissed’ these rumors (Herrera 2002: 318) and Barrantes ultimately accepted the IU candidacy, Barrantes – as discussed above – ran an extremely lackluster campaign. Moderate allies pleaded with Barrantes to attend IU rallies – and also mounted independent efforts to mobilize the votes of non-party-affiliated, left-leaning voters – but to no avail.

In the years after the 1986 election, Peru fell into a dual economic and social crisis with no equal in contemporary Latin American history. The short-term economic boom of 1986-7, in which national income spiked by 9.2 (1986) and 8.5 (1987) percent, gave way to an equally abrupt and severe recession. The Peruvian economy contracted by 8.3 percent in 1988 and 11.7 percent in 1989. Simultaneously, the García administration’s monetization of Peru’s ballooning public debt generated extreme hyperinflation. In 1988 and 1989, Peru’s inflation rates reached an astonishing 1722.6 and 2776.6 percent, respectively, eclipsing the contemporaneous hyperinflation rates in Argentina and Brazil.

51 Interviews with Panfichi, López, and Pease.
Severe recession and hyperinflation coincided with – and, to a substantial degree, contributed to – a violent escalation of the Peruvian civil war. Over the second half of the 1980s, tens of thousands of additional Sendero operatives, state combatants, political activists and elites, and Peruvian civilians (overwhelmingly indigenous peasants) died in assassinations, combat, and attacks (including acts of terrorism). By the decade’s end, the war had produced many tens of thousands of casualties, and the Sendero had established a strong and active presence in most of the Peruvian territory, including the department of Lima and all neighboring departments save Ica.\footnote{These are Ancash, Huánuco, Pasco, Junín, and Huancavelica.} The Sendero had also developed numerous cells in Lima’s pueblos jóvenes and was encroaching on the city center. Ordinary citizens widely assumed that the Sendero would soon defeat the state and establish a Maoist dictatorship.

The IU’s fatal schism occurred in this troubled context, as party leaders conflicted over the proper response to Peru’s dual social and economic crises. IU moderates prioritized democratic consolidation and hence the use of overwhelming force to halt and reverse the Sendero’s relentless onslaught. If Peru’s democracy fell, the partisan left would return to ‘square one’, its decade-long electoral efforts proven for naught. On the moderate view, defeating the Sendero required economic stability in addition to the systematic use of force. Thus, moderates also favored the IU’s participation, with APRA, in a national accord for short-term stabilization, to be achieved through a massive injection of domestic and foreign private capital (Roberts 1998: 250).

Leaders in the revolutionary bloc rejected the moderate position, stating that an accord with APRA and an endorsement of market-based stabilization reform would irreparably compromise the coalition’s status as a genuine political alternative and potential agent of radical change. The IU’s radical elites also staked out a middle position between the state and insurgency. Javier Diez Canseco (PUM), Alberto Moreno (Patria Roja), and others condemned the Sendero but refused to single it out, arguing that the Peruvian democratic regime had also committed terrorist atrocities in the course of its anti-Sendero military campaign and that both the Sendero and the state deserved the IU’s public moral opprobrium.

More broadly, the leaders of the revolutionary bloc held that Peru’s economic crisis and civil war evidenced the societal disconnect, exhaustion, and inherent instability of Peru’s ‘bourgeois’ democratic institutions. On their diagnosis, Peru’s situation required a deeper democratic project in which popular sectors, in proportion to their numbers, would remain organized at the grassroots level, retain the capacity for mass mobilization, and use their collective power to control political decision-making. Fundamentally, the IU’s revolutionary leaders continued to regard mass mobilization as primary and electoral success as secondary (although important). Only the former, in their view, could produce an appropriate shift in the balance of power and policy outcomes between Peru’s elite and popular sectors.

With Popular Action still in tatters and Alán García’s APRA government in free fall, the IU had a major electoral opportunity in the April 1990 presidential election. In anticipation of the election, the IU planned its first national congress for January of 1989, to be held in Huampaní, a small city in Lima province. Importantly, in the two to three years prior to the congress, Barrantes’ internal IU linkages had begun to erode completely. In 1987, he resigned as IU president, thus abdicating formal leadership responsibilities and severing formal ties to the coalition. While remaining informally affiliated with the IU, he began to display a ‘general detachment from the political process’, both internally and externally (Roberts 1998: 255). By the 1989 congress, Barrantes played a marginal, irregular role in the coalition’s internal affairs.

53 Only the most radical elites in the coalition adopted morally ambiguous positions with respect to the Sendero and, more broadly, the use of violence to advance political objectives (interview with López).

54 Some radical organizations within the IU (e.g., the PUM’s libios) created their own armed organizations to defend against hostility from ‘both sides’: the Sendero and the state (interviews with Munive and López).

55 Interviews with López and Munive.
The congressional delegation passed a statute requiring internal primaries for the selection of future presidential candidates. Although the recently registered non-party-affiliated IU members generally supported Barrantes’ candidacy and outnumbered party-affiliated IU members two to one (at a minimum), the leaders of the revolutionary bloc, with their active, disciplined party networks, ‘dominate[d] the internal organization of the United Left’ and might have been able to mobilize the most votes in an internal election (Cameron 1994: 228). Barrantes desired the IU candidacy but calculated that he could lose the primary, given his ideological alignment with IU moderates on the internally polarizing issues of Sendero and the APRA accord.

In order to sideline the PUM and UNIR, the two key actors in the revolutionary bloc, Barrantes pressed the leaders of the independent bloc (e.g., Henry Pease) to reject the IU primary statute, back his candidacy, and in doing so cause the revolutionaries either to exit the coalition (Cameron 1994: 79) or to support him under pain of electoral marginality. Independents Pease, Rolando Ames, and their allies, however, viewed coalition integrity as essential to the left’s electoral viability and to the neutralization of the Sendero. Thus, they refused Barrantes’ request, exhorted left unity and universal respect for IU statutes, and pleaded with Barrantes in public and private to participate in the IU primary, pledging to support his bid. This time, however, Barrantes, instead of caving in to internal demands, followed through on his threat. With a network of allies, Barrantes rejected the independents’ counter-offer and defected from the IU in late 1989, creating a new electoral vehicle, Acuerdo Socialista, and mounting a separate general election campaign.

As the leaders of the independent bloc had warned, Peru’s newly disunited left fared extremely poorly in the April 1990 general election. Henry Pease, Barrantes’ replacement as the IU presidential candidate, received less than ten percent of the vote. Barrantes’ Acuerdo Socialista ticket fared worse, with Enrique Bernales winning just 2.2 percent of the vote in his bid for the Lima mayoralty and Barrantes placing fifth in the presidential contest, with a mere 4.8 percent. Marginal absent Barrantes, the IU disbanded, most elites and activists resuming their constituent party work or independent political careers.

Alfonso Barrantes and the roots of IU’s fatal schism

What factors lay at the root of the IU’s collapse?

Successful party-building is a rare event that does not occur automatically. Chapter One emphasizes that despite numerous major attempts at left-wing party-building in Latin America since the onset of the third wave – and many more minor attempts, which never ‘took off’ – only a handful of new left parties have succeeded. As Chapter One details, the difficulty stems in part from the challenge of organization-building in the contemporary era. The rise of mass media has weakened the incentive for contemporary elites to invest in organization (e.g., the leaders of Argentina’s FREPASO). Yet it also stems from the challenge of unifying large, heterogeneous party organizations and elite networks. To be durable, new parties and coalitions need sources of cohesion, not just strong organizations.

The IU had a strong organization but failed to avert schism. Most scholars have attributed the IU’s split, fundamentally\(^59\), to internal ideological polarization between moderates and \(^59\) The same scholars also assign limited explanatory weight to the IU’s poorly designed, weakly institutionalized procedures for resolving internal conflicts. One might stress procedural design, arguing that that the IU National Leadership Council’s (CDN) consensus requirement, which granted veto power to each constituent party and to the independent bloc through their representatives, limited the scope and efficiency of collective decision-making. The IU’s constituent parties and independent bloc each had two members.

radicals. Roberts (1998) points to the ‘competing projects of IU moderates and radicals’ (246-57), Seawright (2012) to the ‘strategic dilemma that proved impossible to resolve’ between the IU’s ‘pragmatic and revolutionary components’ (43).

In contrast to these authors, the current chapter does not identify internal ideological polarization as a central, structural impediment to new party cohesion. Although low cohesion presupposes some degree of internal polarization, observed variation in internal ideological polarization, in and out of Latin America, does not correlate with variation in the cohesion levels of new parties/coalitions. The differences across Marxist ideologies, for example, are relatively small, but radical left parties and factions in individual Latin American countries have rarely cohered, instead demonstrating extreme sectarianism and fragmentation.

Equally, many new parties have overcome the ‘problem’ of ideologically polarized, regionally dispersed, and well-organized factions. Most successful new left parties in Latin America, for example, including Brazil’s PT (Chapter Four) and Mexico’s PRD (Chapter Five) cohered despite comparatively high levels of ideological and regional heterogeneity and frequent, intense conflicts over program, strategy, and resources.

60 During the 1960s and 1970s, for example, the left parties that created the IU possessed ‘a shared Leninist ideology’ but still functioned as ‘small, secretive, and conspiratorial groups’ characterized by ‘extraordinary levels of fragmentation and factionalism that exacerbated the parties’ sectarian attributes’ (Roberts 1998: 228-9).

61 Others include Uruguay’s Frente Amplio, El Salvador’s FMLN, and Nicaragua’s FSLN.

With some exceptions (e.g., FMLN, FSLN), new parties do not inherit solid brands or the stable electoral incentives for cohesion that such brands generate. Thus, heterogeneous new parties and coalitions that cohere almost always depend on special, ‘nonmaterial’ sources of cohesion (Levitsky and Way 2013). Chapter One identifies (1) shared, violent struggle against the political enemy and (2) a leader with strong crossfactional ties as the two main conditions for robust unity in heterogeneous new parties. The IU did not cohere because it lacked both sources of cohesion.

Violence and the IU

As the first section argues, the Peruvian left did not suffer significant repression under the right-tacking Morales Bermúdez military regime. After democratization, however, the IU did suffer systematic (and somewhat targeted) violence at the hands of the Sendero. Over the course of the 1980s, the Sendero murdered thousands of political elites and activists. The Maoist insurgents reserved particular hostility for the democratic left. Scholars summarize that the Sendero ‘considered the IU...its greatest enemy’ (Burt 2006: 38) and ‘saved its most strident attacks for leftist organizations’ (Gorriti 1999: 11), including the IU’s constituent parties, independent activist networks, and affiliated popular associations and movements (Burt 2006: 38). Although precise figures do not exist, interview evidence suggests that in total, the Sendero murdered several hundreds of left activists, union leaders, and local left leaders.

Crucially, however, the IU’s diverse strands originally cohered in opposition to Peru’s center/right democratic establishment, not to the Sendero\[65\]. Thus, while struggling against a far left insurgency in the field of violent conflict, the IU faced parties/politicians to the right in the field of electoral competition. Shared violent struggle generates cohesion in new parties by uniting heterogeneous forces in electoral opposition to the hostile actor in question (e.g., a party or regime) (Chapter One). The hostile party or regime simultaneously functions as the enemy in combat and the enemy in electoral competition. Since the IU’s enemies in ‘war’ and electoral competition were distinct – indeed, polar opposites – the Sendero’s systematic violence against the IU did not act as a source of cohesion within the electoral coalition.

63 As Chapters 4-5 argues, both sources of cohesion helped offset internal polarization, flexibilize decision-making procedures, and increase elite compliance and cooperation in Mexico’s PRD during the 1990s. The PT’s (Brazil) early cohesion derived from less generalizable sources. Although Lula da Silva’s crossfational ties played a role, the PT’s formal, institutionalized, and amendable system of internal proportional representation – a rarity among new parties – also may have contributed decisively (Chapter 2-3).

To illustrate through contrast, El Salvador’s FMLN had, in approximately the same actor, both a wartime enemy and an electoral enemy. As a guerrilla organization, the FMLN acted as the central anti-regime belligerent in the brutal Salvadoran Civil War (1979-92). Over more than a decade of war, the country’s right-wing military regime invested considerable military resources and political/diplomatic capital in the destruction of the FMLN, eventually killing over 10,000 of its members. Upon demobilizing and becoming a political party, the FMLN, in electoral competition, faced the right-wing ARENA, an authoritarian successor party (or post-authoritarian party), ‘founded and led by high-profile incumbents and supporters’ (Loxton n.d.: 2) of El Salvador’s outgoing right-wing military regime\[66\].

Mexico’s PRD had an analogous, although less extreme, formative experience. The heterogeneous PRD coalesced in 1989 around the goal of wresting power from Mexico’s PRI regime, which stood in the way of the left’s two fundamental goals: democracy and economic equality (see Chapters 4-5). After Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas (future leader of the PRD) lost the 1988 presidential election due to massive PRI fraud, the PRD was born, and the PRI leadership immediately set out to cripple Mexico’s new left party through continued fraud, various forms of bribery and corruption, and the large-scale murder of activists. From the late 1980s to the mid-1990s, PRI-affiliated mafias in the Mexican left’s regional bastions murdered hundreds of PRD activists. Thus, during early development, the PRD faced, in the PRI party/regime, both a violently hostile enemy and an electoral opponent.

To recap, in contrast to parties like the FMLN and PRD, the IU confronted distinct enemies in the fields of violent combat and electoral competition. Consequently, the violence borne by IU activists and local leaders did not generate cohesion within the electoral coalition.

The weak authority of Alfonso Barrantes

‘The IU was not founded by Barrantes. Barrantes was called to preside over it.’ – Marcial Rubio

Like the leaders of other heterogeneous, mass-based new left parties in Latin America (e.g., Lula of Brazil’s PT, Cárdenas of Mexico’s PRD), Alfonso Barrantes generated a minimum of cohesion in the IU through external electoral appeal. Because ‘there was...no individual party on the [l]eft...strong enough to compete with APRA on its own’, the IU, throughout the 1980s, ‘remained heavily dependent on the populist appeal of Barrantes to garner electoral support beyond the organizational networks of the coalition’s vanguard parties’ (230). For the IU’s secondary leaders and constituent party activists and supporters, electoral dependence on Barrantes provided a strong incentive against defection, overriding the ideological, tactical, and resource conflicts that often dominated internal coalition affairs. For the entirety of the IU’s existence, no major constituent party or secondary IU leader ever defected

During the same period, the PRI did not murder a single activist in the conservative PAN.
External appeal alone, however, is a relatively weak source of cohesion. A new party leader with mass appeal may abruptly lose favor in the electorate or, unable to manage internal conflict, defect from his or her party. In order to foster a more robust unity, leaders must combine external appeal with strong cross factional ties (Chapter One). New parties and coalitions, especially mass-based ones like the IU, agglomerate movements, organizations, and elite networks with distinct regional identities, diverse and conflicting ideologies, and – because they have little or no shared history of bargaining and cooperation – weak horizontal linkages. In such a party, a leader who represents the party rather than a specific faction, and who functions as the ‘hub’ of the party network by nurturing strong relationships (‘spokes’) and actively arbitrating between the major factions may be ‘indispensable’ for the resolution of conflict, the forging of compromise, and hence the prevention of debilitating schisms (Ansell and Fish 1999).

As Chapters Three and Five argue, the early PT’s tendências and the early PRD’s corrientes had unique group identities and personal loyalties, adhered to doctrines ranging from orthodox Marxism to welfare-state capitalism, and spanned the territories of the region’s two largest countries. Both Lula and Cárdenas played active, central, and largely conciliatory roles in the resolution of internal conflicts and the negotiation of complex agreements. Their positions at the dynamic center of complex – and, often, otherwise disconnected – internal negotiations enabled them to mediate between the conflicting preferences of moderates and radicals, broker compromises, and enforce discipline when necessary.

Judging from the PT and PRD examples, the IU, given its deep internal divisions, would have benefited from the presence of a ‘unifier’ who stood above faction and functioned as the hub of the sprawling, heterogeneous coalition, with links to both the constituent parties and the less-organized no partidarizados. Yet as Ansell and Fish (1999) observe, ‘demand’ (or need) for a leader with crossfractional ties does not guarantee ‘supply’ (293). As discussed earlier, the main parties that united to create the IU (e.g., PCP, UNIR, UDP) refused to empower rival parties in the coalition by designating a rival elite (e.g., Jorge del Prado, Alfonso Moreno, Javier Diez Canseco) as coalition leader. They designated Barrantes as leader precisely because Barrantes, in addition to enhancing the IU’s national electoral prospects, lacked ties to any of the IU’s constituent parties.

As importantly, Barrantes, once the IU’s official leader, did not build or nurture strong crossfractional linkages. On the contrary, as the previous section demonstrates, Barrantes’ general detachment from coalition affairs, the stubborn, dismissive, and threatening tenor of his (infrequent) negotiations with secondary leaders of the revolutionary bloc, and his near-total disengagement with the IU from 1987 onward all indicate that, throughout the IU’s formative phase, Barrantes did not have strong ties across the coalition’s major factions.

In sum, because Barrantes did not play an active role as internal broker and arbiter, the IU did not have a linchpin of unity in their leader. In contrast, within the PRD and PT, leaders with strong crossfractional ties played a major role in generating cohesion. Thus, just as the IU did not have the ‘benefit’ of violent shared struggle against the political enemy, the coalition did not have a leader who played the essential transactional role assumed by leaders like Cárdenas and Lula. In recognition of the contrast between Lula and Barrantes, specifically, one top IU leader (with personal connections to Lula and the PT) summarized that Lula, unlike Barrantes, was a ‘unifier’ – that there was a ‘huge distance’ between the 70 Barrantes recognized the IU’s divisions and the challenge they posed, remarking in a 1983 interview with La República that ‘[t]here is a series of difficulties we must overcome; difficulties arising from natural differences in ideology, methodology, even habit, differences of party and leader, personal differences’ (La República, August 12, 1983; cited in Adrianzén ed. 2011: 225).

Although scholars and members widely agree that Barrantes did not establish solid ties across the IU’s major factions\footnote{72} they attribute Barrantes’ weak crossfactional ties to elite personalities, on the voluntarist extreme, or to structural polarization within the coalition. Regarding the former, IU members and outside analysts have emphasized the personal qualities of important individuals in the coalition, mainly (though not exclusively\footnote{73}) Barrantes. Barrantes has been described as an ‘aloof’ and ‘ambivalent’ leader ‘who...preferred a direct, personal mandate from the electorate over party or organizational mediation’ (Roberts 1998: 256; emphasis added) and displayed ‘contempt for the political process within the United Left’ (Cameron 1994: 81). In interviews and published testimonies, moderate and radical IU members have frequently noted Barrantes’ caudillismo and autocratic tendencies; his dismissive attitude toward the revolutionary bloc; his insecure and distrustful nature\footnote{74} his practice of demonstrating secondary leaders’ subordination through ‘perverse games’ (e.g., showing up late for CDN meetings or missing them on dubious grounds);\footnote{75} and, more specifically, his personally fraught relationships with key leaders and rivals such as Javier Diez Canseco\footnote{76} and Henry Pease\footnote{77}.

\footnote{76}{On repeated occasions in interviews, IU members spontaneously referred – or, with prompting, attested – to Barrantes’ hostile relationship with Javier Diez Canseco, the IU’s top revolutionary leader and, according to one member, the ‘second most important’ elite in the party (interview with Munive.). A moderate IU elite recalled, for example, that Barrantes and Javier Diez Canseco ‘hated’ each other, met only when necessary (e.g., CDN meetings), and maintained a physical distance during meetings – all for reasons that went beyond ideology (interview with López). The interviewee largely attributed the rivals’ mutual animus to personality differences and even class resentment, as Barrantes came from a humble background, Diez Canseco from a wealthy, elite Lima family.}

Other scholars emphasize structural impediments to the development of crossfactional ties within the IU. In particular, they argue that internal polarization made it impossible for Barrantes to accommodate the conflicting preferences of the coalition’s moderate and dogmatic, sectarian sectors. Roberts (1998) writes, for example, that ‘the moderate and radical agendas were mutually negating’, and that ‘[r]adical demands polarized the political arena in ways that made it impossible for Barrantes to perform an integrative role’ (254, emphases added).

Their merits notwithstanding, the above-cited studies do not place the Barrantes/IU relationship in proper comparative perspective. While one cannot rule out internal polarization or the personal characteristics of key elites as decisive factors in the IU’s collapse, a comparison of the IU to similar new left successes in Latin America provides ground for skepticism – or at least qualification.\(^7^8\) Personal animosities, especially between rival leaders, exist in the vast majority of political parties, successful and failed. Latin America’s new left successes are no exception.\(^7^9\) Equally, the degree of polarization within the IU seems unlikely to have prevented the emergence of a leader with strong crossfactional ties. As discussed above, Lula and Cárdenas led comparably heterogeneous parties and still managed to establish strong

\(^7^8\) On a qualified account, leaders’ crossfractional ties depend roughly equally on several factors, which include the degree of internal polarization, leaders’ personalities, and also – as will be argued below – leaders’ backgrounds and resulting levels of internal legitimacy.

The dissertation’s comparison of Lula, C´ ardenas, and Barrantes suggests that leaders’ prior backgrounds have an important, potentially decisive impact on their ability to forge crossfactional linkages. Unlike Barrantes, Lula and C´ ardenas both entered their parties with personal histories that gave them immediate, broad-based internal legitimacy. Lula’s internal legitimacy stemmed from his active leadership role in the popular struggle against Brazil’s right-wing military-authoritarian regime. Lula ‘cut his teeth’ in the PT’s feeder unions, and, in his capacity as autonomous union leader, became widely recognized on the left as a defender of the working class, a symbol of regime defiance, and a principled voice for political and economic equality in Brazil. Similarly, C´ ardenas had broad-based moral authority on the Mexican left before the creation of the PRD. Although C´ ardenas came from both the PRI and the Mexican elite, he bore the legacy of his father, General L´ azaro
C´ ardenas, a champion of the popular sectors and the most potent symbol of left-wing ideals and policies (e.g., economic nationalism, land reform, public education) in twentieth-century Mexico. In keeping with this legacy, C´ ardenas governed independently of right-wing PRI orthodoxy as governor of Michoac´ an (1980-6), defected from the PRI in 1987 in protest of the party’s neoliberalism, and mounted an independent (and nearly successful) challenge in the 1988 presidential election.

In terms of prior background, Barrantes differed sharply from Lula and C´ ardenas. He entered the IU without a personal history conducive to broad-based legitimacy, or moral authority, on the Peruvian left. Barrantes was a virtual unknown prior to the IU’s creation, and as detailed earlier, his selection as IU leader had much to do with his populist appeal and potential as a candidate, but nothing to do with his connections or legitimacy within the coalition. One member of the revolutionary bloc summarized that in a highly organic coalition, ‘[Barrantes] was as ungrassroots (inorgánico) as could be’\textsuperscript{81} IU radicals who dominated the coalition’s internal organization viewed Barrantes as a populist without left-wing credibility or a serious commitment to popular civil society. The most internally powerful and respected leader in the IU, Javier Diez Canseco, openly described the IU as an electoral front united around a caudillo, Barrantes.

The contempt ran both ways. Barrantes derisively described Peru’s left as an olla de grillos (‘pot of crickets’), in which disorder, confusion, and mutual incomprehension prevailed, and petty quarrels prevented unified action. Barrantes remarked in a late 1980s interview that he could not respect left elites who held forth in university halls but seemed unable to produce concrete proposals for developing Peru\textsuperscript{82}

In sum, both Barrantes and radical left leaders regarded the IU with as an electorally necessary marriage of convenience and little more. While IU members commonly cite Barrantes’ extraordinary ability to connect with voters, none describes him as the coalition’s ‘moral leader’ – a phrase often invoked to describe Lula in the early PT and Cárdenas in the early PRD. In a useful formulation from an independent IU member, Barrantes was ‘accepted as a candidate but contested (discutido) as a leader’\textsuperscript{83}

Chapters Three and Five argue that internal legitimacy gave Cárdenas and Lula a ‘leg up’ in the forging of crossfactional ties. Both leaders leveraged their moral authority to build and nurture linkages across the heterogeneous, largely disconnected PT tendências and PRD corrientes – something other leaders might have failed to do. Barrantes’ lack of internal legitimacy placed a constraint on relationship-building within the IU, most starkly and evidently between Barrantes and the leaders of the revolutionary bloc. Because Barrantes did not ‘come in’ with comparable ideational resources, establishing crossfactional ties posed a greater challenge for him than for leaders such as Cárdenas and Lula.

To recap, violence did not generate cohesion within the IU, and the coalition did not have a leader with strong crossfactional ties. Consequently, save the shared perception that electoral success required left unity, there was little to counteract the heterogeneous coalition’s natural centrifugal forces. At the end of the 1980s, this shared perception changed. On Roberts’ (1998) account, the electoral consequences of a schism ‘were poorly understood by both sides’ (254). Radical leaders seemed to overestimate their ability to win external votes without the populist Barrantes at the head of the ticket, and Barrantes – in the words of one insider – had come to believe that he was ‘el dueño de los votos’ (‘the owner of the [left] votes’). With the electoral incentive for unity gone, the IU did not have any sources of cohesion. Barrantes defected, and the IU collapsed, never to be rebuilt.

85 Interview with Pease. Barrantes’ allies, the interviewee, stated, ‘made him believe that he was the owner of the votes’ (interview with Pease).
This dissertation began with a simple claim: although political parties play an indispensable role in representative democracy, we continue to know relatively little about the conditions for successful party-building. Most of the classic literature on Western Europe and the US examines how cleavages, access to patronage, and electoral rules shape emerging party systems, passing over the more fundamental question: Under what conditions do stable parties and party systems emerge in the first place? Drawing from this literature, a portion of the early scholarship on party-building in third-wave polities assumed that stable party systems would follow, with relative ease, from democratic competition, social cleavages, and the right electoral rules. When outcomes fell short of these expectations, scholars began to emphasize structural impediments to party-building in the third-wave era such as the neoliberal consensus and growth of mass media. In fact, however, third-wave party-building outcomes varied widely. While in many new democracies, social cleavages, electoral engineering, and democratic competition did not give rise to strong parties, in numerous others, strong new parties did take root.

The dissertation has argued that most new parties do not survive because they do not build strong organizations composed of committed activists. As a result, they do not withstand early crises. Paradoxically, parties with strong organizations and committed activists are more likely to form under conditions of adversity. Office-seekers with low access to state resources and mass media have an incentive to do the difficult work of organization-building. Intense polarization and conflict (e.g., civil war, mass political mobilization) generate committed activists by producing the higher causes that spur individuals and groups to collective action.

Although party organization is the primary determinant of new party durability, organization-building entails internal heterogeneity, thus bringing the risk of fragmentation and schism. Preventing fragmentation and schism poses a challenge for new parties, as new parties tend to lack both solid national brands, which provide electoral incentives against defection, and institutionalized procedures for decision-making and conflict resolution. The book has argued that strong party leaders can play a decisive role in preventing fragmentation and schism in new parties. By combining electoral coattails with unquestioned internal authority, a strong party leader can substitute for a brand and set of institutionalized decision-making procedures.

Comparing the PT, PRD, FREPASO, and IU

To illustrate the above claims, the book has provided four analytic narratives of new left survival and collapse. So far, save minor asides, the book has treated these four cases separately, attempting to trace out, in depth, the causal mechanisms at work in each individual case. An explicit comparison of these cases, however, provides additional analytical leverage. In particular, it is instructive to compare (1) the PT, PRD, and FREPASO on the causes and effects of strong party organization, and (2) the PT, PRD, and IU on the causes and effects of strong party leaders.
Chapters Two and Four showed that Brazil’s PT and Mexico’s PRD, shut out of the state and media for the first decade of their existence, depended on organizational strength to achieve initial electoral progress. They built their organizations by drawing human and infrastructural resources from sympathetic civil society actors: in the PT’s case, the Marxist left, Catholic left, and new unions, and in the PRD’s case, the extraparliamentary social left, the traditional Marxist left, and defecting PRD structures.

Chapter Six shows that FG/FREPASO, throughout the 1990s, lacked access to state resources and also, in order to build an organization, could have inherited significant human and infrastructural resources from civil and political society: the CTA, CTERA, and cadres and networks of Marxists, Christian Democrats, and ex-Radicals. Yet the leaders of FG/FREPASO, in particular Chacho Álvarez, had the opportunity to build a national constituency rapidly, through media appeals. The meteoric, media-based rise of a national opposition party or politician almost certainly could not have occurred in 1980s Brazil or 1990s Mexico. Thus, only elite access to media appears to distinguish FREPASO from the PT and PRD, evidencing the critical relationship between media access and organization-building.

In addition to illustrating the causal relationship between media access and organization-building, the comparison between the PT, PRD, and FREPASO evidences the critical importance of organizational strength for new party survival. As detailed in Chapters Two and Four, both the PT and PRD, like FREPASO, faced at least one major electoral disappointment or setback during the formative years. In 1982, the PT expected a strong performance in the Chamber and a Lula victory in São Paulo, but instead won a paltry 3.5 percent of the Chamber vote, while Lula placed a distant fourth. In 1991, the PRD expected to make major gains in the Chamber and position itself for the 1994 presidential election, but instead lost seats. Then, in 1994, Cárdenas lost in a landslide, deflating the collective hope that had animated perredistas since the PRD’s founding – that of rescuing the stolen 1988 presidency for Cárdenas and the left. The PT’s and PRD’s early crises – and, in the PRD’s case, the 1991 crisis especially – dashed internal expectations and threatened party survival. Yet both parties survived and rebounded due to the resilience of activist networks in the parties’ territorial bastions.

One might object that FREPASO faced a more severe crisis than the early PT or PRD. Yet this argument would have been difficult to sustain ex ante. Argentina did face an extreme social and economic crisis in the late 1990s and early 2000s, and in contrast to the PT and PRD, FREPASO was in government and thus received partial blame for deteriorating socioeconomic conditions. Yet judging from objective electoral criteria, FREPASO’s electoral crisis was not obviously worse than the PT’s and PRD’s. In fact, in total absolute terms, it was considerably less severe. After its crisis election of 2001, FREPASO remained Argentina’s third electoral force, retaining six percent of Chamber seats and, crucially, six of seventy-two Senate seats. In contrast, the PT, in 1982, won just 3.5 percent of Chamber seats and zero Senate seats, while the PRD, in 1991, fell to eight percent in the Chamber and won only two of sixty-four Senate seats. Thus, in the immediate wake of their respective crises, FREPASO retained a considerably stronger national legislative presence than the PT or PRD.

Admittedly, neither the PT nor the PRD fell as drastically as FREPASO in official electoral terms. While FREPASO lost sixty percent of its congressional seats, the PT did not have a previous electoral record, and the PRD gained two senators while falling only marginally in the Chamber. Still, the PT and PRD drastically underperformed expectations and, in contrast to FREPASO, could not attribute their crises to a once-in-a-generation exogenous shock.
Strong party leadership:
the PT, PRD, and IU

Just as a comparison of the PT, PRD, and FREPASO helps illustrate the causes and effects of strong party organization, a comparison of the PT, PRD, and IU helps demonstrate the sources and consequences of strong party leadership. During their formative periods, the PT, PRD, and IU were left fronts composed of heterogeneous, well-organized factions: in the PT, the tendências, in the PRD, the corrientes, and in the IU, the constituent parties. The PT, PRD, and IU all coalesced around a charismatic leader with more external appeal than the party or coalition could otherwise command. For all three fronts, the leader’s coattails and the possibility of winning national power provided a strong incentive against lower elite defection. Throughout their formative periods, the PT, PRD, and IU did not suffer major defections of lower elites or factions.

Yet from the beginning, Lula and Cárdenas possessed unquestioned authority within the PT and PRD, while Barrantes clearly did not possess unquestioned authority within the IU. Both Lula and Cárdenas supplemented their unrivaled external appeal with unrivaled internal base-level loyalty. Lula’s legitimacy among base-level petistas extended from moderate to radical sectors. In the remarkably routinized early PT, Lula formalized his unquestioned authority through the creation of a moderate tendência, the Articulação, which attracted early petistas of all stripes, including moderate new unionists, left Catholics, and more radical Marxists. Tellingly, in 1993, at the peak of internal moderate/radical tensions, and just months after the PT’s most extreme left tendência had won the internal election for the Diretório Nacional and National Executive Council, Lula won the internal election for party president by consensus. As party president, and later as the party’s undisputed nominee for the 1994 presidential race, Lula informally imposed a dose of moderation on the 1994 platform and went outside formal party channels to build relationships and alliances to the PT’s right. However begrudgingly, the PT granted him this leeway.
Similarly, Cárdenas commanded the fierce loyalty of base-level perredistas and, consequently, enjoyed a considerable margin of autonomy. The PRD activist base came primarily from the extraparliamentary social left and defecting PRI networks, above all the cardenista ex-PRI network in Michoacán. At the PRD’s birth, national leaders tailored PRD statutes in order to formalize Cárdenas’s unquestioned authority. By informal agreement, they ruled out inclusion of a number-two Secretary General post in the National Executive Committee in order to avoid dualidades de poder (competing power centers). They also required the CEN to vote as a bloc, so that minority elements could not easily veto Cárdenas’s decisions. Cárdenas imposed the radical line of democratic intransigence on the PRD during the late 1980s and early 1990s. Even as the party moderated over the course of the 1990s, Cárdenas, who remained steadfast in his radical positions, secured all of the PRD’s major executive nominations, either by informal consensus or internal primary. In 2000, Cárdenas circumvented formal procedures in securing his nomination for the presidency. In order to expedite the internal nomination process, he accepted another party’s nomination, and the PRD, as Cárdenas anticipated, quickly named him their candidate as well.

Like Lula and Cárdenas, Barrantes held leverage over elite competitors due to his unrivaled external appeal. Yet in contrast to Lula and Cárdenas, Barrantes did not command the unrivaled loyalty of the IU base. The IU accepted him as a candidate but not as a leader. If the distinction of moral leader fell to anyone, it was to Javier Diez Canseco, the most respected leader of the IU’s radical bloc. The IU’s constituent parties, which spanned radical and reformist Marxism, never ceded decision-making authority to Barrantes. At the formal level, each constituent party of the IU, from the coalition’s inception, reserved veto power in the National Executive Committee. In the late 1980s, as hyperinflation and civil war gripped Peru, Barrantes tried and failed to impose a moderate, firmly anti-terrorist line on the IU’s radical bloc. In 1989, he failed to impose himself as the IU’s presidential candidate, and when he accepted another party’s nomination, only a small cadre of moderate independents exited the IU with him. The IU collapsed after an abysmal performance in the 2000 presidential election.

A comparison of the PT, PRD, and IU thus suggests that strong party leaders, by managing internal differences and imposing contentious decisions, can prevent debilitating schisms. Equally, the comparison sheds light on the sources of unquestioned internal authority. The unquestioned authority of Lula and Cárdenas did not come primarily from their contingent decisions or extraordinary leadership skills. Rather, it came from their moral and symbolic endowments and inherited network ties. Due to different factors, both leaders furnished collective incentives to party activists by embodying the founding narratives and credos of their respective parties. Lula, the metalworker, incarnated the PT’s founding myth, which treated the PT as Brazil’s first authentically popular political expression. As the central figure in the new unionism, Lula had worked with leaders from all three main feeder categories, thus inheriting strong crossfractional ties on the PT’s creation. As the sole bearer of his father’s legacy, Cárdenas carried the PRD’s revolutionary nationalism in his blood and commanded the unconditional loyalty of PRD activists and elites from the former PRI and social left. He used both his leverage and his base- and elite-level loyalties to establish strong vertical and horizontal crossfractional ties during the PRD’s early years.

In contrast to Lula and Cárdenas, Barrantes entered the IU without strong network ties or high moral stature. The leaders of the IU’s constituent parties agreed to make Barrantes leader precisely because he lacked ties to any of the IU’s grassroots activist networks. In the words of one radical IU members, ‘he was as inorganic as could be’. Barrantes did not play a visible role in the mass struggles of the late 1970s, which led to the creation of the IU. He did not possess ties to any of the IU’s constituent parties and hence did not threaten to shift the internal balance of power. Far from founding the IU, Barrantes came from the outside and ‘was called to preside’ over it.\footnote{Without a record of leadership in the IU’s founding struggles à la Lula, or a rare source of inherited legitimacy and credibility à la Cárdenas, Barrantes did not stand above other IU elites in moral stature. On the contrary, radical leaders like Javier Diez Canseco commanded the loyalty of the IU’s most powerful organized networks. Expressing the prevailing base-level sentiment, Diez Canseco and other radical leaders openly described the IU as a front around a populist \textit{caudillo}. In Aldo Panfichi’s deft formulation, Barrantes, from the IU’s inception, ‘was accepted as a candidate but disputed as a leader’\footnote{In summary, a comparison of the PT, PRD, and IU helps illustrate that in large, heterogeneous parties, party leaders who combine electoral coattails with unquestioned internal authority can counteract tendencies toward fragmentation and schism. The comparison also suggests that unquestioned internal authority is typically rooted in the leader’s initial moral stature and/or preeexisting ties to the party base.}}

The book’s small-\textit{n} comparison does not test the book’s argument. Instead, it serves to generate the main argument and probe its initial plausibility. This section goes outside the book’s small-\textit{n} comparison, briefly examining a few additional cases, both in and out of sample, in order to gauge the theory’s broader applicability.

\textit{Ex-guerrilla parties: El Salvador’s FMLN and Colombia’s AD-M19}

El Salvador’s FMLN and Colombia’s AD-M19 both succeeded guerrilla organizations and quickly achieved national electoral clout in their respective countries. El Salvador’s FMLN survived and today leads El Salvador. Colombia’s AD-M19 disappeared in the early 1990s, after just a couple of national elections. Why did the FMLN survive, while the AD-M19 collapsed?

Prior to becoming a political party, the FMLN guerrilla organization engaged El Salvador’s military in a bloody, twelve-year civil war that ended in truce. During this period, the FMLN developed in ways that decisively contributed to its later survival as a political party. During the civil war, El Salvador’s regime was authoritarian, exclusionary, and repressive. The need to recruit and protect soldiers impelled the FMLN to establish an extensive grassroots presence, and the FMLN recruited soldiers and active supporters from mass-based civil society organizations like unions, CEBs, and urban popular movements. Years of political exclusion and violent conflict selected for committed members and also generated the higher causes that fueled the FMLN’s diverse rank-and-file. The FMLN was born with a strong organization and committed members.

The M19 (later AD-M19) was born with committed members but a weak organization. From the late 1970s to the mid-1980s, the M19, a small network of guerrilla nuclei, raided military supply posts, laid siege to government buildings, and, in a few instances, directly engaged the Colombian armed forces. In proportional terms, El Salvador’s FMLN – as well as Nicaragua’s FSLN – dwarfed the M19. In 1989-90, when the M19 demobilized and became a political party, Colombia had thirty-three million citizens, fewer than one-thousand of whom M19 members. In contrast, El Salvador, in 1992, had roughly 5.5 million citizens, 15,000 of whom were FMLN soldiers. Thus, while one in every four-hundred Salvadorans belonged to the FMLN in 1992, one in thirty-thousand Colombians belonged to the M19 in 1990. As a political party, the AD-M19 rapidly rose to national renown through elite media appeals, winning over a quarter of the seats in Colombia’s 1990 Constituent Assembly election. After successive setbacks in the 1991 midterms and 1994 general election, however, the AD-M19 collapsed, never to be rebuilt.

Out-of-sample cases: Uruguay’s FA and Venezuela’s LCR

Two out-of-sample left parties in Latin America, Uruguay’s Broad Front (FA) and Venezuela’s Radical Cause, illustrate the book’s two main arguments. The case of the FA, a new left survivor, demonstrates the book’s primary argument that adverse conditions give rise to strong party organizations and committed activists. The story of the LCR, a case of new left collapse, demonstrates the book’s secondary argument regarding strong party leadership and schism.

Founded in 1971, Uruguay’s FA spent eleven of its first thirteen years under military rule, with zero access to public office, very little access to media, and the pervasive threat of arrest and exile. In clandestine opposition to military rule, and in anticipation of post-transition elections, the FA, during the 1970s and early 1980s, established a national network of local nuclei, drawing on its connections to opposition civil society, especially the CNT, Uruguay’s national union confederation. Political exclusion and repression selected for committed activists, and intense polarization between the military regime and the opposition generated the higher causes that united and collectively motivated the heterogeneous FA base. When Uruguay democratized in 1983, the FA claimed a strong organization and committed activist base, key ingredients for survival.

Also founded in 1971, Venezuela’s Radical Cause (LCR) spent the first two decades of its existence on the margins of a powerful, societally rooted Venezuelan party system (AD, COPEI). Like Brazil’s PT in the São Paulo industrial belt, the LCR drew from iron and steel workers’ unions in Guayana City, Bolívar state, to develop a strong regional party organization. After twenty years as a regional party, the LCR, in the early 1990s, rose to national prominence by establishing ties to Caracas unions and picking off disaffected former AD supporters. Party leader Andrés Velásquez won twenty-two percent of the 1993 presidential vote and, absent fraud, likely would have won more.

Yet like Alfonso Barrantes in Peru’s IU, Velásquez was a moderate in a party dominated by radicals, possessed greater external appeal than any LCR elite, but did not hold unquestioned internal authority. The latter distinction fell to radical leader Pablo Medina. In 1988, competing radical and moderate currents had emerged within the LCR. The first, led by Medina, favored military revolt and popular mobilization. The other, led by Andrés Velásquez, favored the electoral route to social transformation. A series of ‘bitter recriminations’ between velasquistas and medinistas followed on the LCR’s humiliating performance in the 1995 regional elections (Buxton 2001: 178). In February of 1997, months before the 1997 general election, internal conflicts resulted in Medina’s defection from the LCR to create the PPT (Patria Para Todos). Medina’s exit eviscerated the LCR base, as Medina departed ‘with...the bulk of the movement’ (Buxton 2001: 178-9). Both the LCR and PPT became marginal and joined alliances with larger electoral forces.
