'Death', Doxography, and the 'Termerian Evil' (Philodemus, Epigr. 27 Page = A. P. 11.30)

The Harvard community has made this article openly available. Please share how this access benefits you. Your story matters.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Published Version</td>
<td>doi:10.1017/S000983880000361X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Citable link</td>
<td>http://nrs.harvard.edu/urn-3:HUL.InstRepos:3775768</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Terms of Use</td>
<td>This article was downloaded from Harvard University’s DASH repository, and is made available under the terms and conditions applicable to Other Posted Material, as set forth at http://nrs.harvard.edu/urn-3:HUL.InstRepos:dash.current.terms-of-use#LAA</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

'DEATH’, DOXOGRAPHY, AND THE ‘TERMERIAN EVIL’ (PHILODEMUS, EPIGR. 27 PAGE = A.P. 11.30)*

The text of this poem, already corrupt in the Palatine, has had a turbulent history over the last two centuries. Here is Page’s version, the translation in Gow–Page,1 and my own somewhat expanded apparatus:

I who in time past was good for five or nine times, now, Aphrodite, hardly manage once from early night to sunrise. The thing itself, – already often only at half-strength, – is gradually dying. That’s the last straw. Old age, old age, what will you do later when you come to me, if even now I am as languid as this.

In 1982 D. Sider responded to Gow–Page.2 First, whereas the latter had said of ῥυτό ῦπειρεπλόν \[KaKov\] in line 4 ‘proverbially = “a great disaster”, “the last straw”’,3 Sider attempted to specify the exact sense, for which the ground had already been laid:4 ‘as Kaibel and others have recognized, Philodemus’ reference is to the Termeros who used to kill people by butting them with his head until he had his head broken by Theseus [in fact it is Heracles] (Plut. Thes. 11) ... a Termerion kakon is the punishment that fits the crime, as is certainly the case in Philodemus where that which has done the butting [the phallus] has had its κεφαλή “die”’.5 We shall return to this explanation later. Sider’s second line of approach came from his belief (correct, I think) that Page’s ῥυμιβαλέσ ‘cannot be allowed to stand unchallenged’.6 Gow–Page were chiefly troubled by the repetition: ῥυτό ῦπειρεπλόν repeats both the wording and the sense of κατὰ βραχύ θνήσκει much too closely; substitute the quite different ῥυτό ῦπειρεπλόν, “at half-strength” (cf. Heraclitus 7.465.2 = 1936, ῥυμιβαλέσ P: ῦπανές P1), and the lines run well’.7 Sider did not agree, keeping ῥυμιβανές, but repunctuating the couplet:

* I thank my colleagues, Professors Albert Henrichs, Ian Rutherford, Calvert Watkins, and Mr Alex Sens, and my former colleague, Professor Hayden Pelliccia, for comments on earlier drafts. They are responsible neither for remaining errors nor for adherence to any specific interpretation here espoused.

4 E.g. by Kaibel, quoted by Gow–Page: ‘iam ego fueram pater Termerium illud malum’. They did not quote him further, but should have: ‘Nam non quoduis malum est Termerium sed quod quis ea corporis parte patitur qua antea peccauerat’. Philodemi Gadarensis Epigrammata, Index Scholarum in Universitate Litteraria Gryphiswaldensi per semestre aestivum anni 1885 a die 15 mens. April. habendarum (Greifswald, 1885), p. 22.
5 Sider, op. cit. (n. 2), 212–13, and 213 n. 15 for parallels for a play on κεφαλή/φαλλός.
6 Sider, op. cit. (n. 2), 212.
7 Gow–Page, op. cit. (n. 1), p. 399. At A.P. 7.465.2 there is a clear vegetative metaphor at work, which is not the case here.
Now his paraphrase of the first four lines: ‘What he used to do up to nine times before he now does only once, with difficulty (μόνες); and the thing itself, the act from start to finish, lasts but a short time (κατὰ βραχύ); and already half-dead his member often dies altogether.’

This seems to me to complicate things even further for at least two reasons: (1) in normal usage κατὰ βραχύ means ‘gradually’, ‘little by little’, even ‘slowly’ – virtually the opposite of ‘a short time’; and this sense ‘gradually’ would in any case already be represented by the words μόνες ἐκ πρώτης ὑπκτος ἐς ἰδίου in line 2, which strongly suggests that ‘the act from start to finish’ now takes all night; (2) πολλάκι does not easily qualify θνήσκει from which it is separated by both ἤδη and ἢμιθανές. Put another way, πολλάκι δ’ ἤδη surely goes together most naturally as an adverbial cluster. So far, then, we have two possibilities, neither entirely satisfactory, for the second couplet: a stop after θνήσκει with πολλάκι… ἢμιθανές parenthetical, or stops after βραχύ and θνήσκει.

There is a further problem: what is a Τερμέριον κακών? Is it, as Sider takes it, the same as a Τερμέριος τίσις? ‘Termerian trouble’ seems in fact to refer primarily to trouble not for Termerus, but for the people Termerus butted. Plutarch, Thes. 11 needs to be quoted in its full context. The subject is Theseus:

ἐν δὲ Ἐλευσίαν Κερκύνα τὸν ἐξ Ἀρκαδίας καταπαλαίσας, ἀνείλε καὶ μικρὸν προειδὼν Δαμαστὴν ἐν Ἐρυνεῖα τὸν Προκρούσην, ἀναγκάσας αὐτὸν ἀποθεῖν τοὺς κλητέρας ὅσπερ τοὺς ξένους ἑκένως ἐπρατῆ δὲ ταῦτα μιμομένων τῶν Ἡρακλεία, καὶ γὰρ ἑκένως οὐ ἐπεβουλεύοντο πρότοσις ἁμομένων τοὺς προκρισιμένων, ἔθεσε τὸν Βούκρω καὶ κατεπαλάισε τὸν Ἀνταωνίῳ καὶ τὸν Κάκινον κατεμονάχθηκε καὶ τὸν Τέρμερον συρρίξας τὴν κεφαλὶ ἀπέκτεινεν. ἂν ὃν δὲ καὶ τὸ Τερμέριον [sic] κακῶν ὁμοιαθῆναι λέγοντας παῖων γάρ, ὡς ἔσοτε, τῇ κεφαλῇ τοῖς ἀντίχρυσοις ὁ Τέρμερος ἀπόλλυν. οὕτω δὴ καὶ θηρεὺς κολάζων τοὺς πονηροὺς ἐπεξῆλθεν, οὐ μὲν ἐθύισιν τοὺς ἄλλους, ἀλλ’ ἑκένως καταβιαζόμενος, ἐν δὲ τοῖς τρόποις τῆς ἕναντι ἀδίκιας τὰ δίκαια πάσχοιτα.

The entire paragraph draws a parallel between Theseus and Heracles, specifically in their common mode of punishing wrongdoers with the same fate those wrongdoers had inflicted on others – a system of punishment elsewhere known as Νεοπτολέμειος τίσις.8

8 Sider, op. cit. (n. 2), 212.

9 Cf. Thuc. 1.64.2; 4.96.4; 7.79.5; Anaxagoras fr. 33 Diels-Kranz; Aristot. H.A. 692b15; at Prot. 329b4, Gorg. 449b8, and elsewhere, Plato uses it to describe the gradual progress of Platonic dialectic. The Ibycus (which produced the above examples) reveals that the phrase, rather rare before the Roman period, becomes very common in the medical writers and is often used to describe the gradual progress of disease, etc.

10 The Ibycus supports this, showing πολλάκις ἤδη frequently in Theognis, Euripides, Thucydides, Plato, Theophrastus, Menander, in the orators, and constantly in later Greek. When the cluster occurs (forming a single unit) with a post-positive particle, that particle always comes between the two adverbs (as here), and is never postponed to follow ἤδη: so πολλάκις μὲν ἤδη at Plato, Gorg. 508d5; Thuc. 3.37.1; Men. Perik. 267; Galen, De sanitate tuenda 6.190; πολλάκις δὲ ἤδη at Theophr. Hist. Plant. 8.10.3; Arrian, Cyn. 16.3.1; Oppian, Haliet. 3.510; πολλάκις γὰρ ἤδη at Gorgias 7.22 (Diels-Kranz); Plato, Gorg. 456b1; Dio Chrys. Orat. 15.12; Galen, de usu partium 3.157, 359, 900 (in each of these categories I have omitted further examples from later Greek).

11 The expression, which does not appear in Plutarch, is explained and defined aetio logically by Pausanias at 4.17.4: it was the fate of Neoptolemus, after killing Priam on the altar of Zeus Herkeios at Troy, to be slain himself by the altar of Apollo in Delphi. He concludes: καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦτο τὸ παθεῖν ὑπὸ τις καὶ ἐθράσει Νεοπτολέμου τῶν ὁμομάχους. It is hard to say whether ἀπὸ τοῦτο is temporal (‘henceforward’ – so the Loeb), temporal/causal (‘from this occurrence’), or even refers to Neoptolemus himself (‘they name it after him’). In fact, there may be more than one nuance to the words. I am evading the very difficult issue concerning competing versions and details of this myth, within the Pindaric corpus and elsewhere, since it Is a ‘Termereian evil, or trouble’ the same as a ‘Neoptolemeian punishment’; for that is more or less what has been taken by critics of Philodemus (who may well have had this latter proverb in mind as they dealt with τοῦτο τὸ Τερμέριον)? I think it is not, and although the inference may proceed from Plut. Thes. 11, it is not the easier one. Let us look at the temporal and logical sequence in Plutarch: Theseus defeated Cercyon and Damastes (Procrustes), in which actions he imitated Heracles, for Heracles had used the methods of wrongdoers against the wrongdoers themselves, sacrificing Busiris, wrestling with Antaeus, fighting Cynus in single combat, and breaking Termerus’ head. Plutarch proceeds with the aetiology of Termereian trouble, in which Heracles has no part: It is from Termerus (αὐτὸ τὴν Τερμερέιον) that Termereian trouble is named: for (γὰρ) it seems he killed those he met by butting them with his head. Like Heracles, then (οὖν δῆ καὶ), Theseus went about punishing wrongdoers with the same fate they meted out to others. The aition on Termerus attaches most easily to the account of how Termerus killed people, while the final sentence relating the actions of Heracles to those of Theseus brings the focus back to the latter and concludes the entire chapter. But in Philodemus’ epigram, from the words τοῦτο τὸ Τερμέριον, Kaibel and Sider first extract πᾶσχο τὸ ‘Τερμερέειον κακόν’ (whose natural meaning would be ‘I suffer a great evil [such as being butted to death]’), and must then supply the sense πᾶσχο τῆν ‘Τερμέρεειον τίσιν’ (= ‘punishment for the “butter’’).

If you look up Τερμέριον in LSJ you will find first a sense ostensibly derived from Plutarch, Thes. 11 (‘Τερμερέειον or Τερμέριον κακόν, τό, prov., a misfortune one brings on oneself’), and second the following: ‘τὸ τῆς, = membrum uirile, dub. in A.P. 11.30 (Phld.’). This second gloss is incomprehensible to a reader of any edition, apparatus, translation or discussion of the epigram from this century – that is from Sider (1982), Page (1975), Aubreton (1972), Gow–Page (1968), Becky (1958), or Paton (1918). But here is the second distich in the 1872 edition of F. Dübner:

οἴμοι καὶ τοῦτ’ αὐτὸ καταβραχύν’ πολλάκις δ’ ἡδη

ήμιθανές θυμίασκε τοῦτο τὸ τερμέριον.

A third possibility, then: a stop after κατὰ βραχύν, but none after θυμίασκει: ‘hei mihi! et hunc [sc. coitum] breuem: saepius uero jam moritur hoc malum’. In this Dübner was accepting Pauw’s Τερμέριον ([sc.] κακόν) and following Jacobs’ supplement τοῦ τῆς αὐτὸ: οὖτο. And stops are likewise present after κατὰ βράχυν, does not directly affect the status of the proverb. On this subject, see H. Lloyd-Jones, ‘Modern Interpretation of Pindar: The Second Pythian and Seventh Nemean Odes’, JHS 93 (1973), 109–37; cf. pp. 131–2; and most recently L. Woodbury, ‘Neoptolemus at Delphi: Pindar, Nem. 7.30ff.’, Phoenix 33 (1979), 95–133; the matter will be treated by I. Rutherford in a forthcoming book on Pindar’s Paeans (Oxford University Press).

12 The Loeb so takes the phrase, and in this is supported by the following γὰρ.

13 Most other references to Termerus or ‘Termerian trouble’ (Philippus of Theangela FGrHist 741 F 3 ap. Schol. Eur. Rhes. 509; Jul. Or. 7.210d; Lucian, Lex. 11; Suidas s.v. Τερμέρα κακά; Paroem. Graec. i.162, ii.215) give no explanation, but in those instances which deal with the actual κακά, we are dealing with huge (though generally unspecified) problems or troubles, not punishments. For some other late references, not very relevant to the present discussion, see G. Türk, ‘Termeros’, RE 5A (1934), 731.

but absent after \textit{θνήσακει} in the other earlier editions, of Tauchnitz (1829), and Brunck (1772–6).\footnote{15} What is astonishing is that this eighteenth- and nineteenth-century consensus is not preserved in the notes or apparatus criticus of any subsequent edition or commentary, only in LSJ\footnote{16}, where it is fossilized in the form of a gloss which is incomprehensible without a research library.

In 1885 there appeared Georg Kaibel’s edition and commentary of the epigrams of Philodemus;\footnote{17} he printed a second distich which is in essence that inherited by Page:

\begin{quote}
o\textgreek{i}mou kai\ ποτε το\textgreek{ου}το κα\textgreek{α} τα\textgreek{β}ραχυ\ (πολλάκι\ δ’ \textgreek{η}δη \textgreek{ημ}ιδα\textgreek{ν}ες) θνήσακει: το\textgreek{ου}το το τερμέριον.
\end{quote}

‘Alas and this one (often already half-dead) is gradually dying. I am suffering the Termerian ill.’ The το\textgreek{ου}το of line 3 now refers to the penis, rather than the act, while that in line 4 (together with το τερμέριον) is part of a separate exclamation (sc. νυν πάσχω), and refers to the poet’s actual condition.

Why the change, and what new problems does it create? Kaibel came up with three structural or contextual objections to Jacobs’ and Dübner’s punctuation and restoration: (1) the \textgreek{ε}ν of 2 is already qualified by μολις and further qualification (κα\textgreek{α} τα\textgreek{β}ραχυ) is impossible; (2) κα\textgreek{α} τα\textgreek{β}ραχυ means ‘gradually’ (paullatim), not ‘soon’ or ‘quickly’;\footnote{18} (3) the first distich constitutes a separate thought to which nothing further can be added. Each of these points is well-taken, and two have already been shown to work against Sider’s repunctuation, as well as that of Jacobs and Dübner.

In dealing with the end of the couplet, Kaibel proceeded to compare Ovid, \textit{Amores} 3.7, an amusing expansion of Philodemus’ epigram, which dwells at great length on the poet’s inability to perform.\footnote{19} Much of the humour of Ovid’s poem derives from the fact that it takes him 84 lines to tell us that nothing happened, and he does so fairly explicitly, referring more than once to the offender: 13 ‘mea membra’; 65 ‘nostra membra’; 69 ‘quin istic pudibunda iaces, pars pessima nostri’.\footnote{20} But Kaibel was concerned to keep such explicitness to a minimum. In rejecting Brunck’s το\textgreek{ου}το το τερμόνιον and Dübner’s tentative suggestion τουθ’ δτι περ μοριον he notes: ‘non solum brevior [sc. quam Ovidius], ut par est, sed uerecundior etiam longe Philodemus, ut u. 1. 2 docet uerbum omissum. Cauebimus igitur ne spurca uocabula inferamus secundo disticho corrupto et impedito’; and a little later: ‘procul habendi ei sunt qui proprium membro nomen restituebant’\footnote{21}. He then distinguishes between Strato, το\textgreek{ου}το κα\textgreek{α}τα\textgreek{β}ραχυ. And in his edition of 1794 (\textit{Anthologia Graeca sive Poetarum Graecorum Lusus ex recensione Brunckii}, i [Leipzig, 1794], p. 73), as the title suggests, he had printed the text of Brunck, who accepted Reiske’s φθειες μοι κα τουτα.\footnote{15} \footnote{16} \footnote{17} \footnote{18} \footnote{19} \footnote{20} \footnote{21}

\footnote{15} Brunck, however (\textit{Analec\textgreek{t}a V\textgreek{e}terum Poetarum Graecorum}, ii [Strasburg, 1773], p. 86), printed φθειες μοι κα το\textgreek{ου} τα\textgreek{β}ραχυ. My colleague, Ian Rutherford, without awareness of these editions, had also thought το\textgreek{ου}το το τερμέριον might be the subject of \textit{θνήσακει}.\footnote{18}

\footnote{16} It was introduced in the sixth edition of 1869: Kaibel’s edition, or more likely Paton’s Loeb of 1918, led to the addition of ‘dub.’ after ‘membrum uirile’ in LSJ\footnote{19} (1940).

\footnote{17} G. Kaibel, op. cit. (n. 4), pp. 21–2.

\footnote{18} Cf. above, p. 131; Sider refers elsewhere to Kaibel, but does not address his objection to so taking the phrase.

\footnote{19} Ovid’s source is unmistakeable: 17–18 (‘quae mihi uentura est, siquidem uentura, senectus, [cum desit numeris ipsa iuuenta suis?]’ is virtually a translation of Philodemus’ third distich, while the first and second are represented respectively by 23–6 (‘at nuper bis flaua Chloide, ter candida Pitho, [ter Libas officio continuata meo est;] exigere a nobis angusta nocte Corinnam, [me memmini numeros sustinuisse nouem]’) and 65–6 (‘nostra tamen iacuere uelut praemortua membra [turpiter hesterna languidiora rosa]’). Cf. also Gow–Page ii, op. cit. (n. 1), pp. 398–9.

\footnote{20} For ‘pars pudenda’ (of which this is a poeticising) = ‘penis’, cf. J. N. Adams, \textit{The Latin Sexual Vocabulary} (London, 1982), p. 45; also \textit{particula}.

\footnote{21} Kaibel, op. cit. (n. 4), p. 21.
Martial, and the Priapic poets on the one hand (who do name the penis) and on the other 'omnes elegantioris judicii poetae' such as Philodemus, who must not be charged with actually doing so.22 He then enlists Pauw: 'has igitur sordes prudenter euitauit, qui prouerbii memor scripsit τούτο τὸ τέρμεριον'. What Pauw meant, as is clear from the translation of Dübner, and from Kaibel's discussion,23 is that the Termerian evil (i.e. the 'penis') is 'dying', but as Kaibel noted 'potuit fortasse poeta suam calamatatem Τέρμεριον κακόν appellare, non potuit membrum ipsum'. Hence his punctuation after θηνίακε, which removes any reference to the penis other than the vague τούτο in line 3. And his treatment has so convinced other scholars that the earlier punctuation and meaning was expunged from the record.

There are, I think, at least two immediate problems with this reconstruction: (1) The τούτο in line 3 and that in line 4 have different referents – as they do in all the other interpretations. This is not an overwhelming obstacle, but it seems rather wanting in an epigrammatist of Philodemus’ elegance. (2) More telling, other usage in the Anthology strongly militates against taking τούτο τὸ τέρμεριον as syntactically independent from what precedes. In poets both before and after Philodemus, when we find τούτο τὸ + noun or adjective, beginning at the medial caesura of the pentameter, the phrase always functions as either subject or object of an expressed preceding verb:24

In five of these cases we see not only this general syntactical parallelism, but also rhythmical or prosodic parallelism, as the pattern of choriambic clausulae suggests what is a virtually ‘formulaic’ system: μαμμάρινον / παιδάριον / λειπόμενον / δαιμόνιον / δωδέκατον. Any critic who approaches τούτο τὸ + noun or adjective, beginning at the medial caesura of the hexameter, as the subject of a following EXEt.25

For support he refers to various epigrams where there is no actual word for ‘penis’: A.P. 12.216 (Strato) where it is called ὀμβή (with ποσάθη or σαθή understood); 12.232 (Scythinus) ὀμβή καὶ ὀστήρας, ἄνώψμην;26 No editor or commentator tells where Pauw published his emendation, and I have simply been unable to find the reference.

The instances were provided by the Ibycus. In two cases (A.P. 9.618.2, 680.4) we find τούτο τὸ λουτρόν, also beginning at the medical caesura of the hexameter, as the subject of a following ἕξει.27

The text is that of Beckby, accepted from the Palatine. The MSS of Theocritus have essentially a different poem, and Gow–Page, The Greek Anthology. Hellenistic Epigrams, i (Cambridge, 1965) print that version, as Gow did at Theocritus. i (Cambridge, 1965), p. 244 = Epigr. 10 (with ἕννα for ἄνθετο, and θῆκε for τούτο). It looks as if we could be dealing even with two genuine but slightly different epigrams, and should not choose between the two.

The poem is assigned to Plato by Diogenes Laertius (3.33), while the Palatine has the lemma Μουσικιών, the Planudean Μουσικιών ὁ Ἐκ Πλάτωνος. Its relationship to Philodemus 27 is uncertain: cf. R. Reitzenstein, Epigram und Skolion (Giessen, 1893), p. 182 ‘seinem Charakter nach könnte es sehr wohl erst um Beginn der Kaiserzeit oder kurz vorher entstanden sein’; id., ‘Platos Epigramme’, NGG (Berlin, 1921), p. 54.

This is parallel in the rhythm it sets up, if not exactly in syntax, since δωδέκατον is in fact a predicate adjective.
Why must we assume, as all editors who print \( \text{Τερμέριον} \) do, that \( \text{κακών} \) is to be understood with it? Philodemus’ use of the adjective is the first attested, and although the proverb presumably predates Plutarch, it need not follow that every use of the adjective specifically presupposes the actual proverb. Why should we not take \( \text{τούτο τό Τερμέριον} \) as meaning (as it does most naturally) ‘this Termerian one’, ‘this thing that exhibits the qualities of Termerus’. What is distinctive about Termerus, at least in the most extensive surviving treatment of the myth in Plut. \emph{Thes.} 11, is his method of killing, by butting. A ‘Termerian thing’, then, will be a ‘butter’, a penis, which can now be allowed to serve as the subject of \( \text{θησακεί} \). This is in line with the formulaic parallels quoted above, and also removes the problem regarding the repetition of \( \text{τούτο}. \) Here is a new version, with Beckby’s \( \muοι \) (Gow–Page: ‘deserves consideration’) supplementing line 3:

\[
\text{oίμοι} \langle \muοι \rangle \text{ καὶ τούτο κατά βραχύ (πολλάκις δ’ ἡθη ἡμιθανεῖς) θησακεί τούτο τό Τερμέριον.}
\]

‘Ah me, and this thing gradually (often already half-dead) is dying on me – this Termerian thing.

The couplet now consists (for the first time in its editorial history) of a single sentence, as do the one preceding and the one following, and (also for the first time) the second \( \text{τούτο} \) merely resumes the first, specifying its meaning as an almost embarrassed postscript. We find a more or less parallel phenomenon at Theoc. \emph{A.P.} 6.338.1–2: ‘\( \text{Τ’μιν τούτο, θεαί, κεκαριμένον ἀνθέτο πάσας | τῶγαλμα Ξενοκλῆς, τούτο τό μαμάμρινον, | μουσικός.} \) Although the first \( \text{τούτο} \) here modifies \( \text{τάγαλμα} \), it is similarly resumed (as object) by the \( \text{τούτο} \) \( \tauο\) phrase.

We are not quite done with \( \text{τό Τερμέριον}. \) It is, I think, possible to view it not just as a nominal adjective, but rather as an actual diminutive noun – ‘little butter’.\(^{28}\) Such a diminutive of a proper name would in origin be of the hypocoristic type suggesting endearment\(^{29}\) and would be parallel with terms of address such as \( \text{Γλυκέρα} \) from \( \text{Γλυκέρα} \), which are formed on an \emph{ad libitum} basis where the context calls for them.\(^{30}\) There are six other instances just in Philodemus’ epigrams (8.1 \( \text{Φιλάινος} \), 9.3 \( \text{Καλλιστῖον} \), 14.6 \( \text{Ξανθάριον} \) [from \( \text{Ξανθώ} \), 14.1], 16.1 \( \text{Θερμίον} \), 16.5 \( \text{Δημάριον} \) [from \( \text{Δημῖο} \), 16.1], 26.2 \( \text{Τρυγώνιον} \)). Indeed, Philodemus may even have gained some notoriety for his use of these diminutives.\(^{31}\) We could also see in \( \text{τό Τερμέριον} \) an appropriate diminutive of the deteriorative type whose real diminutive force

\(^{28}\) For parallel forms in \( \text{-εριον} \), see Kretschmer-Locker, \emph{Rückläufiges Wörterbuch der griechischen Sprache} (Göttingen, 1963), p. 166: \( \text{διφθέριον} \), \( \text{κρησέριον} \), \( \text{πατέριον} \), \( \text{πτέριον} \), and \( \text{χέριον} \), and the Ibycus adds \( \muητέριον \) at \emph{Heliod. Aeth.} 7.10.3.

\(^{29}\) W. Petersen, \emph{Greek Diminutives in -τον} (Weimar, 1910), pp. 173–8.

\(^{30}\) So Aristoph. \emph{Ach.} 404–5 \( \text{Εὐρυπίδης, Εὐριπίδιοι, ἀπάκουσιν} \). Philostratus (\emph{Epist. Erot.} 38) refers to the well-known Glycera of Menander as \( \text{Γλυκέρα} \), and at \emph{Misog. fr. 280 Κό.} Bentley suggested \( \text{χαίρ’ α’ Γλυκέρα} \) where Priscian (18.251) has unmetrical \( \text{χαίρ’ γ’ γλύκερα}. \) Meineke and Köre, however, accept Porson’s \( \text{ο’ γαῖρε, Γλύκερα}. \) On this type of diminutive, cf. Petersen, op. cit. (n. 29), p. 175. There is clearly flexibility in the formation of these diminutives which, given their intensely colloquial nature, must have been far more numerous than our surviving texts can indicate. Philodemus may even have formed it (without strict linguistic accuracy) after, e.g., \( \text{Τιμάριον} \) (Meleager, \emph{Epigr. 59–62 Page}, on \( \text{παιδάριον} \), which occurs at [Plato] \emph{A.P.} 9.39.4 in the same position, and with \( \text{τοῦτο} \) \( \tauο\) (for the chronological issue, see above, p. 134).

\(^{31}\) That is, if we accept, as many do, the suggestion of G. Friedrich concerning the ‘Sorciation’ addressed in Cat. 47 (\emph{Catulli Veronensis Liber} [Leipzig and Berlin, 1908], p. 228): ‘Wir haben nach dem Wortlaut unseres Gedichtes keinen Grund, uns den Sorciation anders vorzustellen als den Philodemus von Gadara, der auch bei Piso in Macedonien war, \emph{Gracius facilis et valde uenustus} (\emph{Cic. in Pis.} 70).’ If this is so, then the name will have perhaps been for Catullus and his group a fine coterie nickname: ‘Little Socrates who was fond of nouns in \( \text{-τον} \).’
(reflecting the ultimate fate of the mythical Termerus) aptly describes the present condition of the poet. Now with the possible exception of Τερμερίνος, the identity of Philodemus’ -tov characters is female, but that is no obstacle: first, that is often the gender of such words (cf. A.P. 12.216.1 ὄρη [sc. ?πώσιθη, ?σάθη]; Lat. mentula, etc.), and second, such a transformation suits the reduced condition of the ‘butter’: what once was a Termerus is now a Termerion. Here we may invoke a precise parallel from TSchol. II. 2.235, which characterizes Thersites’ taunting of the Greeks (Ἄχαιδες, οὐκέτ’ Ἄχαιοι): ‘Ἄχαιδες: παρομοιασία, οία ὡς Φίλιππος, ἄλλα Φιλόππον κεκράτηκεν διὰ Ἑλλάδος.’

To return to the text of Epigr. 27, what are we to say of the repetition in ἡμιθναῖες θηνίακες to which Page (and others before him) objected? It will become unobjectionable if it does not constitute a real repetition, that is if the type of ‘death’ in ἡμιθναῖες is distinct from that in θηνίακες. There are two possibilities: (1) the ‘frequent half-death’ refers to the flaccidity which occurs in the course of the one all-night event. This is then succeeded by the actual death of impotence; but better, I think, (2) ἡμιθναῖες belongs to the vigorous stage, for this is the post-coital ‘half-death’ that already used to occur often – five to nine times a night, to be followed by four to eight resurrections. Hence παλλάκης δ’ ἤθη which far from being mere filler now strengthens the contrast between the first and second couplets: the poet’s temporary ‘half-death’ is a very different one from the progressive death of impotence which the poem laments.

32 Given the nature of Greek society, we will not often find diminutives for ‘penis’; exceptions are found at Aristoph. θεσμ. 254, 515 πόσθων (where the actual diminutive force is also felt), and Clouds 197 πραγμάτων (where the diminutive is perhaps more affectionate, ‘my little thing’); on these see J. J. Henderson, The Maculate Muse (New Haven and London, 1975), pp. 109, 116. Those who so wish will add to these two λυκίθων, for the controversy on which see most recently and conveniently (with further bibliography) J. J. Henderson, ‘Κωδάριον: a Reply’, Mnemosyne 27 (1974), 293–5, and R. J. Penella, ‘Κωδάριον: a Comment’, Mnemosyne 27 (1974), 295–7. We could add ιωθόπην (in Latin perhaps = ‘particula’, for which see Adams, op. cit. (n. 20), p. 45), which is properly if not effectively a diminutive, and Latin ‘mentula’ is also worth mentioning.

33 Trygonion is an interesting name, perhaps related to our subject. It means ‘little dove’ and has erotic associations: Epigr. 26 Page is a difficult poem, but Gow–Page accept Paton’s view (rendered sensible by his emendation of ἄρβι γυναικῶν to ἡμίγυναικῶν [another ἡμι- compound] in line 5) that is an epitaph for his Trygonion, an emasculated priest of Cybele (Γάλλης) who, when he was ‘alive’, ‘alone among the effemates adored the Cyprian’s rites and took to the seductions of a Lais’ (trans. Gow–Page). Are we dealing with a ‘dove’ that has become reduced in the same way as Termerion in Epigr. 27? For columba = ‘penis’, cf. G. Giangrande, Α Commentary on Book One of the Epigrams of Martial (London, 1980), pp. 122–3; Y. Nadeau, ‘Catullus’ Sparrow, Martial, Juvenal and Ovid’, Latomus 43 (1984), p. 862; R. F. Thomas, ‘Sparrows, Hares and Doves: “Source Criticism” and the limits of plurality’ (forthcoming issue of Helios on Catullan criticism).

34 On the artistic desirability of such distinct repetition, see D. R. Shackleton Bailey on Horace’s ‘ruta ... rura’ (Odes 4.5.17–18) in Profile of Horace (London, 1982), pp. 137–8.

35 In the name Mentula in Catullus 94, 105, 114 and 115, we perhaps have an inverted parallel for Termerion.

36 Virgil’s reworking of the Homeric lines is tantalizing: Numanus Remulus’ taunt of the Trojans at Aen. 9.617 (‘o uere Phrygiae, neque enim Phryges’) is set in the context of reminiscence of Cat. 63 and its treatment of the emasculation of Attis; cf. 617–18 ‘iite per alta | Dindyma’ etc.

37 On other poems treating impotence as the death of the penis, the death has actually occurred: Scythinus, A.P. 12.232 (νεκρῶν ἀπεκρέμασο); Automated, A.P. 11.29.3–4 (ἢ πρῶν ἀκαμῆς | Ἰώσα, νεκρῷ μηρῷ πᾶσα δεδεκένες); here cf. the proximity of the language to that of Philodemus (ὁ πρῶν / ἢ πρῶν) – and the two epigrams are juxtaposed in the Anthology (11.29–30). For these, and for Latin parallels, including Ovid, Am. 3.7.65 ‘praemortua membra’ (above, n. 19), see G. Giangrande, ‘Catullus’ Lyrics on the Passer’, Mus. Phil. Lond. 1 (1975),
There is no surviving instance of ἤμιθανές with this precise force, but that is not very surprising given the subject. We have already cited Ov. Am. 3.7.65, from a poem acknowledged as influenced by Philodemus 27: ‘nostra tamen iacuere uelut praemortua membra’ (see above, p. 133). This clearly responds to lines 3–4 of the Greek (and ‘praemortua’ refers to premature impotence), but it also looks to a prior Latin tradition, which is conflated with the ultimate Hellenistic model. I have in mind Catullus 50.14–16, where the poet uses erotic language (but not the language of impotence) to describe the effect on him of Calvus’ poetry: ‘at defessa labore membra postquam | semimortua lectulo iacebant | hoc, iucunde, tibi poema feci’. ‘Semimortuus’ is first found here and is surprisingly rare. Did Catullus coin or use it after Philodemus’ use of ἤμιθανές? If so, both could refer to post-coital exhaustion, real for Philodemus, figurative for Catullus. Although it cannot be known beyond doubt whether Catullus had access to Philodemus’ poetry, it is assumed by many that Poem 32.7–8 (‘sed domi maneas paresque nobis | nouem continuas fututiones’) may refer to this same Epigram 27 of Philodemus (cf. 1 ἐννέα).

I conclude by representing the temporal scope of the epigram with reference to past, present and future in the following version, which reflects the epigram’s careful play with time, and its juxtaposing of past vigour (1–2) and present dysfunction (3–4), with the latter anticipating the permanent impotence of old age (5–6):

I who in time past was good for five or nine times, now, Aphrodite, hardly manage once from early night to sunrise. Ah me, and this thing gradually (often already half-dead) is dying on me – this little ‘Termerus’. Old age, old age, what will be left for you to do later if you arrive, when already now we are as languid as this?

Harvard University

RICHARD F. THOMAS